[Brown (a, 34).]—Mitral systolic m. A m. originating in the mitral valve during the ventricular systole. MUSCLE, n. Mu²s'l. Gr., μῦς. Lat., musculus. Fr., m. Ger., Muskel, Muskelgewebe. An aggregation of muscular (sarcoous) tissue, which is the tissue in the animal body characterized physiologically by its power of contracting in one direction and thus giving rise to definite movements. The structural elements are usually much greater in length than in breadth, and hence are mostly designated as muscular fibres. These may be apparently homogeneous and in spindle-shaped cells or fibres (unstriated, smooth, or involuntary m.), or the substance composing the elements may appear to be composed of alternating segments of light and dark material (striated m.). The striated elements of the vascular system (cardiac m.) are usually quite short, branched, and in Mammalia anastomosing. The skeletal m's are composed of elements much greater in length than in breadth. Only in a few cases do the fibres branch or anastomose. The fibres rarely exceed 40 to 60 mm. in length, and in m's of considerable length the fibres continually terminate and originate, but in short m's they extend from tendon to tendon. Smooth or unstriated m. is mostly in sheets or isolated bundles, and in connection with the organs of vegetative life. It is mostly involuntary, the m. of accommodation forming an apparent exception. Cardiac m. is wholly involuntary, while the ordinary skeletal striated m. is voluntary. That in the cesophagus is an exception, and the m's of respiration are only partially voluntary. [J, 30, 55, 175; S. P. Gage, "Microscope," viii, pp. 225, 257.] For m's with special generic names, such as abductor, adductor, etc., see under those names.—Accessory m's. Balsam-of-Peru plant, growing in New Granada, Ecuador, Peru, Bolivia, and Brazil (where it is called oleo vermelho), and formerly supposed to be the source of balsam of Peru, and by some authors still considered identical with M. pereira. Petroleum spirit dissolves 63.7 per cent., leaving a light-brown, pulverulent resin undissolved, and, on evaporation, an amber-colored, faintly aromatic residue, which gives a red-brown color with nitric acid. It is freely soluble in alcohol and in ether, is partially soluble in carbon disulphide, and, treated with sulphuric acid and cold water, yields a gray mass (Peru balsam striking a bright tint). The wood yields an ethereal oil of sassafras-like odor and burning, aromatic taste. [B, 5, 19, 77, 173, 180, 275 (a, 35); "Proc. of the Am. Pharm. Assoc.," xxix, xxxiii (a, 50).]—M. pubescens. As they proceed toward maturity they lose their gelatinous structure, and become a mass of spores mingled with threads. When the spores germinate, the contents escape either in the form of amoeboids or of zoospores with cilia, which come together and produce mobile plasmodia. The largest division of the group is the Myxogastres, distinguished by the plasmodium being formed of a union of plasmodies and by the spores being developed in the interior of an envelope or false peridium. On gelatin plates, which it does not liquefy, small brown colonies form. [B. 316 (a, 35).]—N. Edingtonii. Syn.: Diplococcus scarlatinae sanguinis [Edington]. A micro-organism observed in cultures from the epidermic scales and the blood of scarlet-fever patients. It occurs as hyaline diplococci of the usual biscuit form, from 1 to 1.2  $\mu$  in diameter. It develops whitish-yellow colonies on gelatin. It is not pathogenic. [J. L. Smith, B. 316 (a, 35).] Cf. MONAS scarlatinus and PHLOX scindens.—N. Franklandiorum. Syn.: Micrococcus Franklandiorum (seu caudicans [Frankland]). A species observed in Great Britain in atmospheric air. The cocci were coupled in the biscuit form and were 1.05  $\mu$  long. [B. 316 (a, 35).]—N. gonorrhoea. Ger., Mikrokokkus der Gonorrhoea. Syn.: Micrococcus gonococcus (seu gonorrhoea). Neisser's gonococcus; a species occurring in small, irregular heaps in or on the pus-cells in gonorrhoea, and especially abundant in the later suppurative stage of the disease. The coccus is usually in the form of a diplococcus, about 1.25  $\mu$  in length, and shows in stained specimens under a high power of the microscope a distinct partition in its middle, which gives it the usual roll or biscuit form of members of the genus. It is from 0.8 to 1.6  $\mu$  in its long and 0.6 to 0.8 in its transverse diameter. Moderately firm blood-serum (the cocci do not develop on the ordinary nutritive substrata, nutrient jelly, etc.), inoculated with the secretions containing cocci, presents on its surface a very thin grayish-yellow layer with moist smooth surface, consisting of closely packed cocci. Inoculations of the cocci on animals produce no effect. The inoculations of the cultivations produce typical gonorrhoea in healthy persons. The cocci become decolorized after treatment with Gram's iodine solution. [B. 238, 316 (a, 35).]—N. lactea. Syn.: Micrococcus lacteus faviformis. A non-infective micro-organism occurring in vaginal secretions, in the secretion from the cervix uteri, in sputum, etc., in the form of diplococci about 1.25  $\mu$  long, each divided by a fissure into two hemispheres and presenting the usual biscuit or roll form of the genus. In preparations from cultivations the cocci lie side by side, presenting a faviform appearance. They develop readily on various soils, forming milk-white confluent colonies. [B. 238, 316 (a, 35).]—N. lyssae. Syn.: Micrococcus lyssae (seu rabidus). A micro-organism very common in the brain, spinal cord, spleen, etc., in rabies. The cocci (diplococci) have the roll form, are hyaline, and are from 0.8 to 1.05  $\mu$  in length. It liquefies gelatin readily. On agar-agar it forms whitish-yellow layers, and on potatoes hemispherical colonies of a dirty-white color. It has never been observed outside of the bodies of rabietic patients. [B. 316 (a, 35).]—N. Micheli. The Trachomococcus of Michel; a micro-organism occurring in conjunctivitis aegyptiaca in the form of hyaline cocci resembling those of N. gonorrhoeae, from 0.6 to 0.8  $\mu$  in their long and from 0.4 to 0.6  $\mu$  in their transverse diameter. In gelatin cultivations they become larger, forming yellowish colonies. [B. 316 (a, 35).]—N. petechialis. Syn.: Micrococcus petechialis. A diplococcus of the biscuit form, from 0.5 to 0.6  $\mu$  in length, occurring in the blood and eruptions of typhus-fever patients. It liquefies gelatin, and on potatoes forms very prominent whitish-gray colonies, changing in time to grayish-yellow. [B. 316 (a, 35).]—N. rebellii. A micro-organism the cocci of which resemble those of the gonococcus. It occurs in persons with follicular trachoma. It readily liquefies gelatin, and on potatoes forms colonies of white flocci. [B. 316 (a, 35).]—N. rosacea. Syn.: Micrococcus rosaceus [Frankland]. A species observed in atmospheric air in Great Britain. The diplococci, of the usual biscuit form of the genus, vary in size, the largest being 2.5  $\mu$  long. It is apparently non-pathogenic. [B. 316 (a, 35).]—N. rosea. Syn.: Micrococcus roseus. A saprophytic micro-organism occurring in atmospheric dust on nutrient substrata. The diplococci, which are 1 to 1.5  $\mu$  in length, resemble those of N. gonorrhoeae, but the partition between the hemispheres is broader than in the latter. On gelatin plates, which it does not liquefy, it grows luxuriantly, forming round colonies of a beautiful rosy hue, and on agar-agar and potatoes it forms a smooth, rosetate layer. [B. 238, 316 (a, 35).]—N. subflava. Syn.: Micrococcus subflavus. The yellowish-white diplococcus of Bumm; a species resembling N. gonorrhoeae, but differing from the latter in retaining the aniline dye after treatment by Gram's method. It has been observed in the lochia, in the urine in some cases of catarrh of the bladder, in the blebs in pemphigus neonatorum, in the pus from an abscess of a mammary gland, and (Fränkel) in the vaginal secretions in a number of children with inflammation of the vagina without gonorrhoea. The inoculations do not produce gonorrhoea. According to Bumm, a large abscess containing diplococci is formed if the cocci are injected into the subcutaneous tissue in man. The cocci, which are 0.5 to 1.5  $\mu$  in diameter, form on gelatin, which they liquefy, whitish-gray points and, finally, ochre-colored confluent masses. [B, 238, 316 (a, 35).]—N. tardissimus. Syn.: Diplococcus albicans tardissimus. A non-pathogenic micro-organism occurring in pus from the urethra. The cocci are morphologically identical with those of N. gonorrhoeae (Flügge). On gelatin, which it scarcely liquefies, it develops very slowly, forming white colonies, and on blood-serum, at the body temperature, it eventually forms grayish-white spots with jagged edges and a somewhat moist surface. [B, 238, 316 (a, 35).]—N. Weichselbaumii. Syn.: Diplococcus (see Micrococcus) intracellularis meningitidis. The micro-organism discovered by Weichselbaum in the effusion of cerebro-spinal meningitis, and occurring as diplococci with the usual biscuit or roll shape of the genus, sometimes forming minute glomerules. [B, 316 (a, 35).]—N. Winkleri. Ger.: Micrococcus (oder Mikrokokkus) bei Beri-Beri. Hyaline diplococci having the roll form of the genus, observed in persons suffering with beri-beri. It liquefies gelatin slowly, and on agar-agar forms milk-white colonies. [B, 316 (a, 35).]

Fr., laurier rose, oléandier, laville, rosage, lavrose, fleur de Saint Joseph. Ger., gemeiner Oleander (oder Rosenlorbeer), Lorbeerrose. Common oleander, rosebay, South-sea rose of Jamaica, the νέριον and ποδωδύρεος of the ancients, who used it against snake-bites; a fragrant-flowered evergreen shrub, with thick lanceolate leaves, which exude a milky juice when punctured, indigenous to the Levant and naturalized in southern Europe. The plant is a local irritant and an active general poison, resembling digitalis in its action. The root contains neriin, and a powerful cardiac poison, oleandrin. An extract of the root is said to be useful in the treatment of valvular cardiac disease; under its influence, according to Pouloux, the heart-beats become regular and the pulse grows full and hard, and in some cases the secretion of urine is increased and the oedema reduced. Its long-continued use is said to reduce the frequency of epileptic attacks. The leaves are used in decoction as an external application in various cutaneous complaints. NERVE, n. у́срв. Gr. νῆρῶν. Lat., nervus. Fr., nerf. nerve (2d def.). Ger., Nerv, Rippe (2d def.). Sp., nerbio. 1. A definite tract of living substance, usually in the form of a white cord, by which molecular changes in one part of an organism influence some other part. Ordinarily the n's are composed of bundles of n-fibres joined together by connective tissue. Such a bundle is called a funiculus. Several funiculi bound together by connective tissue constitute a n., or nervous cord. The whole is bound together by one or several outer sheaths. [A, 12; C.] For other and earlier uses of the word see NERVUS (2d def.). 2. In botany, a nerve; in general, any vein or thread of fibro-vascular tissue in a leaf or other phylline structure; in a special sense, an unbranched thread of a leaf as distinguished from those which divide (veins). [B, 1, 19, 123, 291 (a, 35).]—Abdominal cutaneous n's. Lat., nervi cutanei abdominis. Ger., Hautnerven des Bauches. The sixth cranial n., distributed to the external rectus of the eye. Its apparent origin is by several filaments from the constricted part of the corpus pyramidale, close to the pons, or from the lower border of the pons itself. The deep origin has been traced between the fasciculi of the corpus pyramidale to the posterior part of the medulla. Stillinger has shown its connection with a nucleus common to the facial n. It passes forward by the side of the body of the sphenoid bone, through the cavernous sinus, lying on the outer side of the internal carotid artery. It enters the orbit through the sphenoidal fissure, lying above the ophthalmic vein. It then passes between the two heads of the external rectus muscle, and is distributed to that muscle on the ocular surface. [F; L.]—Accelerator n's of the heart. Lat., nervi accelerantes cordis. See Augmentor fibres.—Accessispinal n. [E. Coues]. Accessory n. (of Willis). See Spinal accessory n.—Accessory obturator n. Lat., nervus obturatorius accessorius. A small anomalous branch of the obturator n. or of the lumbar plexus which descends along the inner margin of the psoas to a point behind the pectineus, where it divides into branches distributed to the hip, the knee, and the adductors of the thigh. [L. 31, 142.]—Acoustic n. See Auditory n.—Afferent n. A n. which conveys impressions from the periphery toward the centre of the nervous system. It arises from numerous white lines or striæ which come from the posterior median fissure in the anterior wall or floor of the fourth ventricle. It is also connected with the gray matter of the medulla. The roots are connected, on the lower surface of the middle peduncle, with the gray substance of the cerebellum, with the flocculus, and with the gray matter at the border of the calamus scriptorius. The n. winds around the restiform body, from which it receives fibres, and passes forward across the border of the crus cerebelli in company

On the left side it enters the thorax between the common carotid and subclavian arteries, and behind the innominate vein, to cross the arch of the aorta, below which it lies behind the root of the left lung, and finally passes down on the anterior aspect of the oesophagus to the anterior surface of the stomach, where it divides into numerous branches. On the right side it crosses the right subclavian artery and passes behind the right innominate vein and the root of the right lung, where it forms the posterior pulmonary plexus, from which it is continued in two parts, which, after uniting with fibres from the left n. to form the oesophageal plexus, unite into a single cord which passes down behind the oesophagus to the posterior surface of the stomach, where it divides into a number of branches. It gives off the superior and recurrent laryngeal n's and branches to the integument of the posterior portion of the outer ear, to the pharyngeal plexus, and to the lungs, heart, stomach, and trachea. It communicates with the facial, the hypoglossal, the glossopharyngeal, and a varying number of the cervical n's, and

It arises by a number of roots, the upper from a nucleus in the medulla oblongata close to the central canal, and the others from the gray matter of the anterior cornu of the spinal cord as low as the sixth or seventh cervical n. The lower roots ascend between the anterior and posterior roots of the spinal n's, and unite with those from the medulla into one trunk, which enters the skull through the foramen magnum, and emerges, in company with the pneumogastric n., through the jugular foramen. At or a little after its exit from the foramen it divides into the accessory portion, which unites with the pneumogastric n. just below its inferior ganglion, and a branch which pierces the sterno-cleido-mastoideus, to which it furnishes branches, and passes across the suboccipital triangle to the lower surface of the trapezius, which it supplies. [L. 7, 142, 172, 332.]—Spinal n's. Lat., nervi spinales. Fr., nerfs spinaux (ou rachidiens). Ger., Rückenmarksnerven. The n's which have their origin in the spinal cord and emerge between the vertebrae. They are 31 in number on each side (8 cervical, 12 dorsal, 5 lumbar, 5 sacral, and 1 coccygeal), and, with the exception of the cervical and coccygeal n's, are numbered according to the vertebra next above. In the cervical region the first n. is above the atlas, and the eighth n. below the seventh cervical vertebra. The coccygeal n. passes out through the lower end of the sacral canal. Each n. is formed by the union of an anterior and a posterior root, which have their respective origins from the spinal cord opposite its anterior and posterior cornua. The posterior and larger root is connected with a ganglion placed in the intervertebral foramen, except in the case of the first and second cervical n's, where the ganglia are situated opposite the laminae of the vertebrae, and the sacral and coccygeal n's, where they lie within the vertebral canal. The two roots unite within the foramina and divide immediately on their exit into an anterior and posterior branch. The posterior branches of each n., except the first cervical, the fourth and fifth sacral, and the coccygeal, divide into an external and an internal branch, which are distributed to the muscles and skin in the immediate vicinity of the spinal column. The internal division of the second cervical n. is known as the great occipital n., and the fourth and fifth sacral n's do not divide into the internal and external branches. The anterior divisions of the spinal n's form the cervical, brachial, lumbar, and sacral plexuses, and in the dorsal region constitute the intercostal n's. A system of ganglia and intercommunicating fibres so called on account of the belief that it established a sympathy between remote organs, especially in cases of disease. It consists of a series of ganglia on each side of the spinal column, those of one side intimately connected with each other by ascending and descending branches, and less intimately with those of the opposite side, also the ophthalmic, otic, Meckel's, and the submaxillary ganglia and the various offshoots from all the ganglia and their branches to the nervous plexuses, spinal and cerebral n's, blood-vessels, and viscera. The two chains of ganglia are united in front of the coccyx by the ganglion impar, and upon the anterior communicating artery of the brain by the ganglion of Ribes. The intercommunicating n's are both gray and white, those running from the ganglia to the n's are gray, those from the n's to the ganglia are white, and those to the viscera, plexuses, ganglia, and blood-vessels are both gray and white. In the cervical region there are 3 pairs of ganglia, in the dorsal 12, in the lumbar 4, in the sacral 5, and in the coccygeal 1. In the cervical region the chain or cord is situated behind the carotid sheath and contains the superior, middle, and inferior cervical ganglia. In the thorax it lies beneath the pleura, about on a line following the heads of the ribs, and from its ganglia are given off branches to the vertebrae, the thoracic aorta, and the splanchnic n's. In the lumbar region it is placed along the inner margin of the psoas magnus and furnishes branches principally to the spinal n's and the abdominal, aortic, and hypogastric plexuses. In front of the sacrum it is diminished in size and converges toward its fellow to unite in the ganglion impar. Of Du Bois-Reymond, an electric current believed to be constantly present in normal living muscles and nerve. [K.]—Natural n-c. The current which passes through a nerve or muscle when in a state of rest. [K.]

NERVED, adj. Nu<sup>2</sup>rvd. Lat., nervatus. Fr., nervé. Ger., benervt, nervig, nerventragend. Having nerves, nerve, nervose, nervigerous (usually said of leaves with prominent nerves [ribs] as distinguished from those with reticulated threads [veins]). [B. 1, 19, 123, 291 (a, 35).]

NERVE-ENDINGS, n. pl. Nu<sup>2</sup>rv'e<sup>2</sup>nd'iz<sup>2</sup>nz. Fr., terminaisons nerveuses. Ger., Nervenendigungen. The terminations of nerve-fibres. They are: (a) the central termination or origin, in the axis-cylinder process of nerve-cells, in the central nervous system (brain and myelon), and perhaps also in the peripheral ganglia; and (b) the peripheral terminations in the various tissues and organs, in which the fibres either divide into axis-fibrillæ and form an anastomosing network or terminal plexus, or form specialized bulbs or swellings, or end in terminal modified epithelial cells (neuro-epithelia), as in the organs of sense. [J.]

NERVE-FIBRES, n. pl. Nu<sup>2</sup>rv'f'bz. Lat., fibrae nervæ, fila nervæ, tubuli nervei. Fr., fibres nerveuses. Ger., Nervenfasern, Nervenaden, Primitivfasern, Primitivröhren. The elongated thread-like elements of the nervous system. Each n-f. consists of an axis-cylinder, and in most cases of a neurilemma and a medullary sheath. According to the presence or absence of the latter, the fibres are divided into two groups—the white, or medullated, and the pale, or non-medullated, n-f. The peripheral n-f., except near their termination, are combined into bundles of various sizes by means of connective tissue. [J. 10, 30, 31, 35.]—Medullated n-f. Lat., Myelinic n-f. Fr., fibres nerveuses médullaires (ou à myéline), tubes nerveux à myéline (ou à double contour, ou de la vie animale, ou blancs). Ger., doppelconturirte Nervenfasern, Markfasern. N-f. with a sheath of myelin inclosing the axis-cylinder. They are found only in the vertebrates, with the possible exception of some Crustacea. In the peripheral medullated n-f. there is present also a neurilemma, so that they consist of at least three parts, a central axis-cylinder, inclosed by the medullary sheath, which in turn is inclosed by the neurilemma. In these nerves the medullary sheath is partly or completely interrupted at regular intervals, with a corresponding constriction of the neurilemma, forming the nodes of Ranvier. In the medullated nerves of the central nervous system and of the optic nerve the presence of a distinct neurilemma is denied by most authors, although affirmed by others. Nodes of Ranvier have not, however, been demonstrated in the medullated nerves of the central nervous system. The medullated n-f. lose their medullary sheath before terminating centrally in a nerve-cell or peripherally in any form of nerve-ending. They rarely divide except near their peripheral terminations, and a division is always at a node of Ranvier. [J. 26, 30, 31, 35.]—Non-medullated n-f. Fr., fibres de Remak, fibres nerveuses grises (ou gélatineuses, ou nutritives, ou sympathiques, ou végétatives, ou sans moëlle, ou sans myéline), tubes nerveux à simple contour (ou sans myéline). Ger., Gallertnerfasern, Knötchenfibrillen, gangliöse (oder gelatinöse, oder rauhe, oder marklose, oder organische, oder Remak'sche) Nervenfasern. N-f. in which the axis-cylinder is not inclosed in a sheath of myelin. They form the larger part of the sympathetic nerves, and are found in small numbers associated with the medullated n-f. Except in some Crustacea, only non-medullated n-f. are found in the invertebrates. A non-medullated nerve-fibre in its highly developed form consists of a fibrillated axis-cylinder, or essential part, inclosed in a sheath corresponding to the neurilemma, on the ental surface of which are irregularly placed nerve-corpuscles. Non-medullated nerves frequently divide and anastomose throughout their entire course, thus differing from medullated fibres, which divide only at their termination. In their embryonic condition all nerves are non-medullated; and even in the adult all n-f., whether medullated or non-medullated, are non-medullated at their origin in the axis-cylinder process of a nerve-cell and at their peripheral termination. [J. 10, 30, 31, 35.]—Opaque optic n-f. Fr., fibres nerveuses optiques à double contour. Ger., markhaltige Sehnervenfasern. N-f. which, instead of losing their medullary sheaths as they pass through the openings in the lamina cribrosa, retain them as they debouch into the eye, and spread out on the retina, and hence appear under the ophthalmoscope as an opaque white patch on the red background. [F.]—Organic n-f. Pale n-f. See Non-medullated n-f.—Primitive n-f. See N-f.—Remak's n-f. See Non-medullated n-f.—Secretory n-f. Fr., fibres nerveuses glandulaires. Ger., secreatorische Nervenfasern. N-f. distributed to a gland and determining the amount or quality of the secretion. [J. 57, 124.]—T-form n-f. Fr., tubes nerveux en T. Ger., T-förmige Nervenfasern. 1. Two n-f. arising by a division of the nerve-fibre of a unipolar spinal ganglion-cell at the first or sometimes at a more distant node of Ranvier. The two fibres usually extend approximately at right angles with the original fibre, like the top of the letter T. [J. 10, 30.] 2. A single nerve-fibre formed at a node of Ranvier by the union of two n-f. each of which originates from a distinct nerve-cell; also called T-formed n-f. [Ranvier, "Compt. rend." 1875; J. 31.]—Trophic n-f. Fr., fibres nerveuses trophiques. Ger., trophische Nervenfasern. Special n-f. distributed to the tissues and controlling their growth and nutrition. The end-organ is unknown, and the existence of special trophic fibres apart from the vaso-motor nerves is denied by many physiologists. [J. 19, 57, 67.]—Tubular n-f. See Medullated n-f.—Varicose n-f. 1. N-f. destitute of a neurilemma, with varicosities due to the accumulation of fluid between the medullary sheath and axis cylinder. [L. 351.] 2. In the United States it yields a tobacco inferior in quality to that of N. tabacum, though it is regarded, as some of its popular names imply, as the source of the very superior tobacco known as Turkish and Latakia. As a medicine, it has the properties of N. tabacum. In Greece its empyreumatic liquid, separated in the pipes, is popularly employed in exanthematous diseases. ou vrai, ou à larges feuilles, ou de la Floride, grand tabac, herbe à l'ambassadeur (ou à la reine, ou à tous maux, ou de Sainte-Croix, ou du grand prieur), jusquiame du Pérou. Ger., gemeiner (oder virginischer) Tabak. Virginian tobacco-plant; a species indigenous to tropical America, now widely cultivated in both hemispheres. It has a simple unbranched stem, sometimes 6 feet high, bearing at the top a panicle of pink flowers. The leaves are alternate, simple, oblong, lanceolate, and at the lower part of the stem somewhat stalked and of larger size, sometimes 2 feet long. The herbaceous parts of the plant are covered with soft hairs exuding a glutinous fluid. When fresh, the leaves have a very narcotic odor and a bitter, nauseous taste. The dried leaves, the tabacum of the U. S. Ph., have a peculiar penetrating odor wanting in the fresh plant. They contain nicotine, nicotianine, a very small percentage of essential oil, malic, citric, acetic, oxalic, and pectic acids, and a small proportion of sugar, cellulose, albuminoids, and of fats and other bodies extractable by ether. Tobacco-smoke is very complex in composition, but, if nicotine (which does not occur, according to Vohl and Eulenber) is excepted, the only constituents found in appreciable quantities are numerous basic substances of the picolinic series. A dark-brown, acrid, highly poisonous empyreumatic oil is obtained from tobacco by distillation. Tobacco used in moderation causes in those accustomed to its use a gentle exhilaration or a state of quietude and repose. Its excessive use produces dyspepsia, general anemia, amblyopia from neuritis, and cardiac distress. Its active principle, nicotine, is a powerful sedative poison which has a depressant action on the motor-nerve trunks. Tobacco was formerly much used as a relaxant, but its use is attended with danger, as its poisonous principle is easily absorbed by the skin. [B. 5, 18, 19, 34, 173, 180, 185, 275 (a, 35).]—N. trigonophylla. See under N. attenuata.—N. viridiflora. See N. paniculata.—Oleum nicotianae. The sp. gr. of the concentrated acid, containing not more than 0.5 per cent. of water, is 1.53 at 15° C. The strongest acid obtainable contains 99.80 per cent. of the pure acid, and is decomposed at ordinary temperature. N. a. has been used internally in intermittent fever, in diarrhoeal diseases, in whooping-cough, and as a tonic, especially in syphilis, and topically as a caustic. [B.] "Proc. of the Am. Pharm. NITROGEN, n. Nit'-ro-je'n. From nitrov, nitre (see nitrum), and yevav, to produce. Fr., azote. Ger., Stickstoff. Syn.: azote. A non-metallic element discovered by Priestley in 1772. It was then called "mephitic air" and "phlogisticated air." Lavoisier pointed out its elementary character and called it azote; and Chaptal gave it its present name. It occurs in the free state in the atmosphere. Combined with carbon, it gives rise to the group of cyanogen compounds, and united with hydrogen, oxygen, and carbon, it forms a constituent of the alkaloids, of nearly all the organic compounds found in the animal body (including the proteids, albumins, and coloring principles), and of many inorganic substances. It is a colorless, odorless, and tasteless gas, liquefiable under very great pressure and at a low temperature. Sp. gr., 0.9718. N combines directly with only a few elements, the chief compounds of this class (called nitrides) being ammonia and the oxides of n, and does not enter into combination energetically; hence it does not give rise to the phenomena of combustion, as oxygen does, and it is not inflammable itself. The compounds formed by its indirect union with many elements are very numerous and important. Associated with hydrogen, it forms ammonia, and this is the starting-point of a vast number of derivatives called amides and amines. Associated with oxygen, it forms nitrous acid and nitric acid, and enters into the composition of the salts of these acids. The fact that in an atmosphere of n, the violet rays of the spectrum disappear before the blue and green has led to the supposition that n is a compound body, and indications have been discovered of an active allotropic n, analogous to ozone. In composition, n acts usually as a trivalent radicle, replacing 3 atoms of hydrogen. Often, however, it is quivalent and replaces 5 atoms of hydrogen. Symbol, N; atomic weight, 14.01. The composition of liquid n, tetroxide is probably  $N_2O_4$ , while the gas consists of a mixture of this substance with another having the composition  $NO$ , the proportion of the latter constituent increasing as the temperature is elevated. The comparatively large body within and usually near the centre of any typical cell and forming an integral part of it. Its significance as an integral part of the cell was first recognized by R. Brown, who gave the name in 1831 (‘‘Ann. Soc. Trans.” 1833, p. 710). The latest researches into the nature and functions of the n. confirm, but enlarge and modify, the ideas originally promulgated by Schleiden, Schwann, and especially Martin Berry (‘‘Philos. Trans.” 1841, p. 207), that the n. is a special agent in cell-multiplication. According to Hofer, the n. is a regulating centre for protoplasmic movement and has a direct influence on digestion. This is something of the form of an inverted L, the lateral wings being sometimes separated from the lateral cell-group of Westphal. Taken as a whole, the oculo-motor n. is the most cephalic in situation of any of the nuclei of the proper cranial nerves; caudally it is continued as the trochlear n. Ph's, the seed of Strychnos n. v. It is a light grayish, irregularly orbicular seed, less than 1 inch in diameter, about  $\frac{1}{4}$  inch thick, slightly depressed toward the centre, and in the superior varieties having a carinate margin. Its surface has a glistening aspect, due to a covering of appressed radiating hairs. The seed has a bitter taste, but is without odor, though its powder has a faint sweetish smell. It shows on section a mass of translucent horny albumin, divided into 2 parts by a fissure containing the embryo, which is about  $\frac{1}{8}$  inch long, and has a clavate radicle and a pair of delicate heart-shaped cotyledons. N. v. contains, besides a yellow coloring matter, a concrete oil, gum, starch, bassorin, and several earthy phosphates, and two poisonous alkaloids (strychnine and brucine) combined with igasuric acid. According to Desnoix, it also contains a crystallizable base, igasurine, separated by Schutzenberger into nine alkaloids; but this is doubted by most investigators. The properties and uses of n. v. are those of its chief alkaloid, strychnine. [B, 5, 18, 172, 180 (a, 35); B, 95 (a, 38); "Proc. of the Am. Pharm. Ger., absteigender Bauchmuskel. The most external of the muscles covering the lateral surface of the abdomen by its muscular portion and the anterior surface by its aponeurosis. It arises from the outer surfaces of the eight lower ribs by muscular slips which interdigitate with the origins of the serratus magnus and latissimus dorsi. The fibres from the lower ribs descend almost vertically to be inserted into the anterior half of the outer edge of the crest of the ilium. The remaining fibres pass downward and forward and terminate in a broad aponeurosis which, when it reaches the outer border of the rectus abdominis, fuses with its aponeurosis and the united structures to blend in the middle line with those of the opposite side, extending from the os pubis to the xiphoid cartilage. [L, 332.]—O. abdominis internus (seu profundus). Fr., oblique du bas-ventre interne ascendant (ou petit). Ger., aufsteigender Bauchmuskel. A broad, irregularly quadrilateral muscle having its fibres directed obliquely upward from behind forward and situated beneath the o. abdominis externus. It arises from the posterior surface of Poupart's ligament, the anterior superior spine of the ilium, the anterior two thirds of the crest of the ilium, and the lumbar fascia. The portion arising from Poupart's ligament arches over the spermatic cord (over the round ligament in the female) to be inserted through the conjoined tendon into the crest of the pubes and the pectineal line. Those fibres arising from the anterior portion of the crest of the ilium run upward and inward, and terminate on the anterior surface of the abdomen in a broad aponeurosis which unites in the middle line with that of the opposite side, while those arising from the posterior portion of the crest of the ilium and the lumbar fascia pass nearly vertically upward to be inserted into the inferior borders of the cartilages of the lower three or four ribs. Of or belonging to the eye; conducted by means of the sense of sight (said of an examination); as a n., an eye-piece; the part of a compound optical apparatus, such as a telescope or microscope, into which the observer looks. It is usually composed of two or more lenses or systems of lenses, and its general function is to give an enlarged virtual image of the real image formed by the objective. [J, 2, 55, 94, 113, 156, 185.]—Achromatic o. Fr., oculaire achromatique. Ger., achromatisches O. An o. in which the chromatic aberration is wholly or nearly eliminated. [J, 200.]—Aplanatic o. Fr., oculaire aplanatique. Ger., aplanatisches O. An o. corrected for spherical aberration, with the chromatic aberration usually eliminated. [J, 200, 210.]—Binocular stereoscopic o. Fr., oculaire binoculaire stéréoscopique. Ger., stereoskopisches Doppel-O. An o. composed of two o's about as far apart as the two eyes and connected with a single tube which is put in place of the o. of a unocular microscope. By an arrangement of prisms the image-forming rays are divided, half being sent to each eye through the corresponding part of the double ocular. That of Tolles is also erecting. [J, 200, 210.]—Compensating o. Fr., oculaire de compensation. Ger., Compensations-o. An o. especially constructed for use with apochromatic objectives and serving to correct or compensate for aberrations in the objectives outside the axis. [J, 210.]—Erecting o. Fr., oculaire redresseur. Ger., Bildumkehrendes o. An o. with which an erecting prism is connected so that the image in the compound microscope appears erect as with a simple microscope; it is mostly used for dissecting microscopes. [J, 200.]—Goniometer o. Fr., oculaire à goniomètre. Ger., Goniometer-O. An o. with a goniometer for measuring the angles of microscopic crystals. [J, 156, 200.]—High o. An o. that magnifies the real image from ten to twenty times. [J, 200, 210.]—Huygenian o., Huygens's o. Fr., oculaire d'Huygens. Ger., Huygens'sches O. A negative o. designed by Huygens for the telescope, now very largely used for the compound microscope. It consists of two plano-convex lenses with the convex surface of each looking toward the objective. The lower and larger is the field lens, or collective; it serves to make the image formed by the objective somewhat smaller, while the upper, smaller, or eye lens magnifies the real image. The two lenses of this o. serve to compensate for each other's defects and thus give a final very satisfactory image. [J, 200, 205, 210.]—Low o. An o. magnifying the real image from two to eight times. [J, 200.]—Micrometer o., Micrometric o. Fr., oculaire micrométrique. Ger., Micrometer-O, Mess-o. An o. with which is connected a micrometer for the purpose of measuring the real image of objects, their actual size being found by multiplying the spaces of the o. micrometer required to measure the real image by the valuation of the o. micrometer determined with a stage micrometer. [J, 200, 205.]—Microscopic o., Microscopical o. Fr., oculaire microscopique. Ger., mikroskopisches O. An o. consisting of one or more converging lenses or lens systems, the combined action of which is like that of a simple microscope, magnifying the real image formed by the objective. [J, 200, 210.]—Negative o. An o. in which the real image is formed somewhere between the two lenses or lens systems of the o. The lower (or field) lens is in this case called a collective, as it serves to make the real image smaller than it would otherwise be. As the field lens acts in the formation of the real image, it is sometimes considered a part of the objective. The upper (or eye) lens of a negative o. magnifies the real image. A negative o. may readily be distinguished from a positive one, as it can not be used as a simple microscope if the field lens is turned toward an object. [J, 200, 210.]—Orthoscopic o. Fr., oculaire orthoscopique. Ger., orthoskopisches O. An o. with an eye lens like one of the combinations of an objective, and a double convex field lens in the focus of the eye lens. It gives a large, flat field. [J, 205, 206, 210.]—Par-focal o's. Of Penock, o's so mounted or so constructed that they may be interchanged without the microscopic image getting out of focus. With high powers, it is usually necessary to focus for the greatest clearness, but even with these the image remains nearly in focus on changing o's. [J, 200; "Micr. Bull.", iii, 1886, pp. 9, 31 (J).]—Periscopic o. Fr., oculaire periscopique. Ger., periskopisches O. A positive o.

devised by Gundlach. It has a double convex field lens and a triplet eye lens. [J, 200.]—Positive o. An o. in which the real image formed by the objective is below the o.; in this case the entire o. acts like a simple microscope to magnify the real image. A positive o. may be readily distinguished, as it may be used as a simple microscope when the lower end is turned toward the object. [J, 200, 210.]—Projection o. Fr., oculaire de projection. Ger., Projektions-o. An o. especially designed for projecting the image formed by a microscopic objective on a screen for class demonstration or for photography. [J, 200, 210.]—Ramsden's o. A positive o. formerly much used for micrometry, consisting of two plano-convex lenses with the convex surfaces facing and very close together. [J, 200, 210.]—Searching o., Seeker o. Fr., oculaire d'orientation. Ger., Sucher-O. A low o., used especially with high objectives, for the purpose of finding or locating minute objects or parts for study with the working o's. [J, 200.]—Solid o. Fr., oculaire holostère. Ger., holostisches O., Vollglass-O. A negative o. devised by Tolles, consisting of a solid piece of glass with a moderate curvature at one end for a field lens and a much greater curvature at the other for an eye lens. Opposite the level of the real image a groove is cut and filled with some dark material to serve as a diaphragm. It is especially adapted for use when a high o. is desired. [J, 200.]—Spitzeno' (Ger.). A micrometer o., now little used, in which two needle-points connected with projecting screws serve to indicate by their separation the size of the real image of an object. The actual size is then obtained by means of a stage micrometer. [J, 156.]—Working o. Fr., oculaire de travail. Ger., Arbeits-o. An o. used for ordinary microscopical observation, in contradistinction to a searching o. (q. v.). [J, 200.]

OLEA (Lat.), n. f. Ol(o<sup>2</sup>l<sup>2</sup>/e<sup>2</sup>a<sup>2</sup>). From elaia, the olive-tree. Fr., olivier. Ger., Olbaum. A genus of oleaceae trees or shrubs distinguished by 4 subovate corolline segments and by the 1-seeded drupe. The Oleaceae (Fr., oléacées) are the oliveworts, an order of gamopetalous dicotyledons, consisting of trees or shrubs, natives chiefly of the temperate regions, with bitter, tonic, and astringent properties. Some of them differ from other oil-plants in containing the oil in the sarcocarp of their fruits instead of in the seed or kernels. The Oleaceae of Benth and Hooker are an order of the Gentianales, and are characterized as follows: Stamens 2 (rarely 4), alternate with the corolline segments; corolla 4 to 5 or many-parted; style simple with a terminal stigma; ovary 2-celled with the ovules fixed to the septum; and stipules wanting. The order includes the Jasminaceae, Syringaceae, Fraxinaceae, and Oleaceae. The Olea (Fr., oléa) are a tribe of the Oleaceae, distinguished by the fruit being a fleshy drupe or berry, by the presence of the corolla, and by the simply leaves (as in O. Osmanthus, Phillyrea, etc.). The Oleinae and Oleineae (Fr., oléinées) are (1) the Oleaceae and (2) the Olea. [A, 496; B, 1, 19, 34, 42, 104, 121, 170, 180 (a, 35).]—Fructus oleae. The fruit resembles an English sloe in color and size. [B, 172 (a, 35).]—O. europaea. Fr., olivier d'Europe, olier. Ger., ächter (oder gemeiner) Olbaum. It., Sp., olivo. 1. The (European) olive; an evergreen tree abundantly cultivated in the Mediterranean regions and to a less extent in California, southern Australia, and other warm countries. The ripe fruit, which is an oval deep-purplish drupe from half an inch to an inch or more long, contains in its sarcocarp nearly 70 per cent. of olive-oil. The immature fruits are hard and extremely acid, but after being soaked in an alkaline solution and pickled they form an esteemed article of diet. All parts of the plant (except the ripe fruits) contain mannite, the unripe fruits especially, from which it disappears as they ripen, being apparently transformed into olive-oil. The leaves and bark are tonic, and are used as a febrifuge. In France a hydro-alcoholic extract of the leaves is used as an antiperiodic. [A, 496; B, 5, 18, 19, 77, 173, 180, 185 (a, 35); "Proc. of the Am. Pharm. Ger., Weihrauch. It., olibano. Sp., olibano, incenso [Mex. Ph.] Roum., o. [Roum. Ph.]. Ar., luban. Heb., lebannah. Syn.: thus. Frankincense; a gum-resin obtained by incision from the stem of Boswellia Carterii and other species of Boswellia which grow in eastern Africa, near Cape Gardafui, and on the southern coast of Arabia. It occurs in commerce in translucent tears or in irregular lumps, having a dull waxy fracture, and a yellowish or brownish color, though the purer varieties have a greenish tinge or are nearly colorless. It has a terebinthinous, bitterish, but agreeable taste, and a balsamic odor, especially when burnt. It contains a large proportion of gum (believed to be identical with gum arabic), from 56 to 72 per cent. of a resin soluble in alcohol but insoluble in alkalis, and from 5 to 8 per cent. of a colorless volatile oil containing olibene. O. is chiefly used as an incense, though it is probably equal to other balsamic medicines as a stimulant to the mucous membranes, and its use as a fumigatory in bronchitis and chronic laryngitis is recommended. The ancients used it in pectoral complaints, dysentery, fevers, etc., and in China it was employed internally in leprosy and scrofula. In the East it is still used for gangrenous sores, etc., and internally in gonorrhoea. Ph., Russ. Ph., Swed. Ph.]. See O. Indian o. Lat., o. indicum. Ger., indischer Weihrauch. The o. of commerce; so called because Bombay is the chief emporium for the drug. It was for a long time erroneously identified with the product of Boswellia serrata (see Indian FRANKINCENSE), and is still described by many authors as differing from Arabian or African o. especially in being more stalactitic in shape. It is probable that an inferior luban mayeti has been described under this name, which, according to Garcias da Horta, is often applied by the Arabs to a dark-colored variety of o. Birdwood asserts that no o. is produced in India. [A. 496; B. 5, 18, 19, 77, 180, 185 (a. 35).]—Male o. Lat., o. masculum. Ger., Männleinweihrauch. O. occurring in globular drops. [A, 520 (a, 29).]—Adams's (Sir W.) o. for ectropium. The o. of excising a triangular piece of the lid through its entire thickness, and then bringing the edges of the gap together with fine hare-lip pins, to shorten a morbidly elongated lid. [F.]—Agnew's o. 1. An o. for chalazion, in which the lid is opened with a narrow knife along its ciliary margin, in the line of the openings of the ducts of the Meibomian glands, the knife being carried well up into the tumor. Then the contents can be squeezed out between the thumb and finger, or can be removed with a small spoon or curette. 2. An o. for destruction of the lacrymal sac, in which the canaliculi are slit up into the sac, and the outer wall of the sac is opened through the conjunctival cul-de-sac by a vertical incision, either in front of the caruncle or behind it. The lips of the wound are then held wide apart by small elevators or sharp shields, and the wall of the sac is cauterized with nitric acid or by the galvanocautery. No external scar is left. 3. An o. for salivary fistula, in which a fine probe is inserted into the opening of the duct on the inside of the cheek, and one or two threads are passed by means of a needle between the external surface of the cheek and the duct at a distance above the orifice. This seton directs the flow of saliva into the mouth, and when this is accomplished the fistulous opening may be closed by caustics. 4. An o. for secondary cataract, in which a needle is thrust from the nasal side through the cornea, about a line from the sclerotic, into the middle of the opaque membrane. An incision is made in the outer side of the cornea, and a small sharp hook is thrust into the opening in the membrane made by the needle. The membrane is fixed by the needle. The hook is then rotated so as to tear and roll the membrane upon itself, which is then withdrawn on the hook through the opening in the cornea. [E; F.]—Alexander's o. See ADVANCEMENT of the round ligaments.—Allarton's o. See Median cystotomy.—Allingham's o. for hæmorrhoids. The ligature of the tumors after partially dividing their bases with scissors, so as to leave as little to be tied off as possible, except the vessels supplying them. [E.]—Amussat's o. 1. See Amussat's colotomy. 2. It sometimes involves excision of the coccyx for the sake of additional room. 3. A method of uniting a completely divided intestine by passing both the ends over a piece of cork till they are invaginated and tying them upon it, the cork having a groove or constriction. [E.]—Anagnostaki's o. 1. An o. for entropion in which a horizontal incision is made through the skin of the upper lid for its whole length, parallel to the ciliary margin, and 7 to 8 mm. above it. From the ends of this incision vertical incisions are made downward not quite to the lid margin, and the long quadrangular piece of skin thus inclosed is excised. The wound is then closed with sutures, and the ciliary margin is thus drawn upward. 2. An o. for trichiasis, in which the cilia that are to be excised are included between two vertical incisions which diverge somewhat above. The cilia having been excised, a portion of the flap of skin lying between the incisions is resected, drawn down until it reaches about half a line beyond the margin of the lid, and attached by a suture at each corner. Shortening of the external lip of the lid margin is thus avoided. ["Ann. d'ocul." 1887 (F).]—Anaplastic o. See ANAPLASTY.—Anel's o. 1. Ligation of an artery close to an aneurysm on the cardiac side. 2. An o. for stricture of the lacrymal duct, consisting in the introduction of a gold probe, as large as a pig's bristle, with a small olive-shaped end, through the upper canaliculus into the sac, and then downward through the nasal duct into the nose. The probe is then withdrawn, and by means of Anel's syringe, some astringent fluid is injected through the lower canaliculus into the sac. [E; F.]—Anandale's o. See ANANDALE'S OSTECTOMY.—Antyllus's o. An o. for aneurysm. [B.]—Arlt's o. 1. A modification of Gallard's o. for entropion, in which the lid is marked off into three equal parts, about 1 ctm. apart. In the middle the skin of the lid is raised into a horizontal fold, and a strong ligature is passed with a curved needle through the base of the fold, in the line of the innermost mark. The needle is then reversed, and brought out 3 to 4 mm. from the point of entrance. The same is next done in the line of the outermost mark. The respective ligatures are then brought over a small roll of charpie and tied. At the end of 48 hours the ligatures are cut and withdrawn. [F.] 2. An o. for ectropion following caries in the lower lid, in which an incision is made through skin and muscle from the inner canthus downward and outward to a point just below the middle line of the lid. A second incision is made from the end of this incision upward and outward to a point beyond the edge of the scar. From this point a short incision is made perpendicular to the lid margin, through the entire thickness of the margin. From this point to the outer canthus the lid is completely scalped. The skin is then dissected up around the scar, and the irregular triangle included in the first incision is separated from the fascia tarso-orbitalis as far as the orbital margin of the tarsus. The lid is then replaced in its proper position and held in place by sutures, and is shortened according to the amount of ciliary margin removed. The raw triangular surface left by the reposition of the skin may then be considerably lessened by dissecting up the skin on both sides and using suture pins and twisted sutures. ["Wiener med. Ztschr." 1858, No. 51, 1860, No. 27 (F).] 3. An o. for entropion, in which the lid is put on the stretch with a hard-rubber spatula, and the skin of the lid is pulled upward so as to evert the ciliary margin slightly. Then with a double-edged scalpel or a Beer's cataract knife the lid is split from the external canthus to the vicinity of the lacrymal punctum, into an anterior and a posterior layer. In the former lie skin, orbicular muscle, hair-bulbs, and in the latter are tarsus, Meibomian glands, and conjunctiva. This incision is about 3 mm. deep. The skin of the lid is then put transversely on the stretch, and a transverse incision is made from one end of the lid to the other, parallel to the ciliary margin, and 3 to 4 mm. from it, through the skin and down to the tarsus. Then the skin of the lid is again put vertically on the stretch, and a curved incision through the skin is made from one end of the transverse incision to the other, the convexity being upward, and varying in curvature according to the size of the piece of skin to be removed. This irregularly oval piece of skin is then removed with curved scissors, leaving the muscular fibres intact. This space is then closed by bringing the edges of the skin together by five or six sutures. The needles are first passed through the bridge of skin just over the cilia, and include some of the fibres of the orbicular muscle, but at the upper margin of the wound they pass through the skin only. The result is a horizontal cicatrix, the previously inverted cilia being turned outward and sometimes upward. The sutures are to be cut off short and left in for 3 to 4 days, and then carefully removed. 4. An o. for stricture of the lacrymal duct, in which the internal canthus is put on the stretch by dragging the lids outward and upward, and a vertical incision is made in a plane that runs through the middle of the internal commissure and just beneath the canthal ligament. The point of a knife is introduced at right angles to the plane of the ligament for 4 to 5 mm., the handle is raised vertically, and an incision 5 to 7 mm. long is made downward. This opens the anterior wall of the sac, the pus is removed, and a sound is passed into the duct. 5. An o. for symblepharon, in which the pterygium-like process of thickened conjunctiva is seized with a forceps near its point, a cataract knife is introduced beneath it, and it is thus separated from the margin toward the centre of the cornea. The flap so formed is then dissected back from the sclera, a ligature armed with a needle at each end is passed through it near its apex, and in such a way that the outer surface of the flap covered with epithelium is applied to the globe. The needles are then passed through the eyelid at the bottom of the wound, and the ends of the ligature are knotted over a roll of sticking-plaster. 6. A form of blepharoplasty, in which the cantho-temporal incision inclines downward instead of running horizontally, and the temporo-gal incision is somewhat inclined to the inner side of the triangle instead of being parallel to it. The other steps of the o. are the same as in Dieffenbach's o. 7. An o. for enucleation of the eye, in which the conjunctiva is first seized with a strong Blömer's forceps between the margin of the cornea and the insertion of either the rectus externus or rectus internus, and divided vertically. The incision is then prolonged with straight probe-pointed scissors downward and upward close to the corneal margin for 3 to 4 mm., and the conjunctiva is pushed backward. The muscle is next seized with the same forceps and divided a short distance back of its insertion, so as to leave a stump as fixation point for the forceps. This opens the sheath of the eyeball. The same scissors, introduced through this opening, are swept round close to the sclera, beneath the tendon of the inferior rectus muscle, and this is divided. The same is done with the rectus superior. Then the stump of the first muscle divided is grasped with the forceps, and the eyeball is turned inward or outward until the entrance of the optic nerve is brought forward almost in a plane with the canthi. The optic and ciliary nerves are then divided with the same scissors or a much stronger pair curved on the flat. Then by a strong pull forward the eyeball is brought into the palpebral aperture, so that it can be grasped by the fingers. The remaining muscles and conjunctiva are then divided close to the globe. [F.]

A form of sclerotomy in which the incision is made and completed in the scleral margin with a narrow knife, but the overlying conjunctiva is left undivided. The iris prolapses under the conjunctiva, and remains as a small swelling. [F.]

—Bartisch's o. An old (1589) o. for entropion, in which the entire ciliary margin of the lid from one end to the other was removed throughout its whole thickness, from skin to mucous membrane, for a width of about 2 to 3 mm. [F.]

—Barton's o. 1. The removal of a V-shaped piece of bone, base forward, from just above the condyle of the femur, for ankylosis of the knee. 2. A form of resection of the hip, in which a crucial incision is made over the great trochanter, the soft parts are dissected from the neck of the bone, a retractor is passed beneath it, and it is divided almost completely with a saw, and finally fractured. [E.]

—Battery's o. See Oophorectomy.

—Baudens's o. See Baudens's amputation.

—Béclard's o. See Béclard's amputation.

—Beer's o. 1. An o. for artificial pupil, in which an incision was made in the cornea with a narrow lance-knife, the iris was seized with a sharp hook, drawn out of the wound, and cut off close to the cornea with curved scissors. In cases of closed pupil Beer made a flap incision in the cornea, pulled out the iris with a hook, and cut off the apex of the pouch, thus leaving a round pupil. 2. Iridotomy by introducing a narrow lance-knife or Beer's cataract-knife through the margin of the cornea into the anterior chamber, and dividing the iris transversely for a distance of 3 or 4 mm. The divided radial fibres cause a gaping of the wound, and thus an elongated pupil is formed. [F.]

—Berlinghieri's o. An o. for entropion and trichiasis, in which the lid is placed on the stretch by a horn spatula, and a horizontal incision is made through the skin and orbicular muscle, 1 mm. above the anterior lid-margin, and from one end to the other. From the ends of this incision vertical incisions 3 to 4 mm. long are made through the skin and orbital muscle toward the orbital margin. Skin and muscle are then dissected up and drawn back toward the orbital margin. The individual hair bulbs are extirpated, and the flap is replaced and held in position by adhesive plaster. [Pisa (F.).]

—Berlin's o. 1. An o. for entropion, in which the lid is fixed with a Desmarres's lid-forceps, and an incision is made through the entire thickness of the lid, parallel to the ciliary margin and 3 to 5 mm. above it. Then the margin of the tarsal wound is seized with a forceps, the skin and muscular fibres are pushed aside, and a piece 2 to 3 mm. wide is cut from the entire length of the tarsus and conjunctiva. The wound is closed as in Streetfield's o. [Arch. f. Ophth., xviii, 2, p. 91 (F.).]

2. A form of blepharoplasty, in which a triangular piece of skin is excised as in Dieffenbach's o. and the horizontal incision is begun several mm. on the temporal side of the canthus instead of at the canthus. From the beginning of this incision another incision is made downward, which, after a distance of several mm., meets the outer incision of the triangular space. Another incision downward on the temporal side is then made, parallel to the second incision. The base of this spur may be a centimetre or more wide. The flap is then slid over this spur into the triangular space and fastened as in Dieffenbach's o. [F.]

—Blandin's o. An o. for symblepharon, in which the cicatricial adhesions are dissected from above downward, free from the cornea, and as far as the cul-de-sac. This dense cicatricial tissue is then turned inward so as to form a substitute for the palpebral conjunctiva, and doubled down to form a hem, which is then retained in position by the glovers's suture. The two extremities of the thread are carried horizontally to the right and left and fixed to the temples. [Gaz. méd., 1846 (F.).]

—Blasius's o. See Blasius's cheiloplasty.

—Bonzel's o. An attempt to form an artificial pupil by separating the iris from its peripheral attachment by means of a hook passed through a small hole in the cornea. [Jour. der prakt. Heilk., Jan., 1815, p. 47 (F.).]

—Borelli's o. An o. for staphyloma in which two needles are passed crucially through the base, and a ligature is twisted behind the needles and firmly tied. The needles are then either withdrawn or cut off at the ends. [Giorn. d'oftalmologia ital., i, 1858 (F.).]

—Bowman's o. 1. See

Von Ammon's o. 2. An o. for fistula of the lacrymal gland, in which one of two curved needles with which a stout silk suture is provided at its ends is passed through the fistulous opening, and then above the tarsus through the wall of the fistula into the conjunctiva; the second needle is introduced in the same way, but brought out through the conjunctiva 4 to 5 mm. from the first needle; the threads are then tied, passed along the outer canthus, and allowed to remain (from 8 to 14 days) until the conjunctival opening of the fistula becomes permanent. Then an attempt is made to close the external fistula, by freshening the edges of the opening and introducing fine sutures. [Ophth. Hosp. Rep., i, p. 286 (F.).]

3. An o. for iridodesis, which consists in incising the iris radially from the pupillary margin toward the periphery with a very narrow flat knife having a blunt end and one cutting edge. This is introduced through the cornea and passed between the iris and lens; the edge is then turned forward and the iris incised. The slit so made in the iris is subsequently caused to gape by the action of the muscular tissue of the iris. [Carter (F.).]

4. An attempt, in cases of ptosis arising from insufficient action of the levator palpebrae superioris, to diminish the relatively excessive action of the orbicular muscle by passing a subcutaneous ligature beneath the tarsal portion and drawing it tight. [F.]

5. An o. for stillidium lacrimarum, which may be done on either one or both lids. If on the lower lid, the lid is drawn outward and slightly downward, so as to evert the punctum. A small probe is inserted into this, passed through the canaliculus into the sac, and then withdrawn, and with a Bowman's or Weber's knife, or with a pair of scissors, the canaliculus is slit up as far as the sac, so that the incision faces toward the eyeball. The next day a probe is to be run along the wound, in order to prevent the cut edges from reuniting. If the upper canal is to be slit, the upper lid is to be drawn outward and upward. [Med.-chir. Trans., 1851 (F.).]

6. An o. for stricture of the lacrymal duct, in which the lower canaliculus is slit up as in the o. for stillidium. A small Bowman's probe is passed horizontally through the canaliculus until its point strikes the inner wall of the sac. The probe is raised vertically, still keeping its point carefully against the wall of the sac, until in its vertical position it points in the direction of the duct. It is then to be pressed slowly but steadily downward and somewhat backward in the course of the duct, as far as possible through the stricture. If this succeeds, on the next day a larger probe is introduced, which after 15 to 20 minutes is carefully withdrawn. This probing is to be continued, each time with a larger probe, till No. 7 or No. 8 has been introduced. The probes are introduced at increasing intervals until the epiphora ceases. [Ophth. Hosp. Rep., Oct., 1857 (F.).]

—Brainard's o. 1. An o. for ectropion, in which the lid is dissected up from its adhesions and placed in its natural position. To fill the space, a flap is formed behind the external angle of the eye, of corresponding form but somewhat larger, with its base or pedicle over the anterior part of the zygoma. This is turned on its base, fitted into the space, and retained in place by interrupted sutures. The sides of the wound left by the removal of the flap are then brought together and retained by sutures. [Am. Jour. of the Med. Sci., Oct., 1845 (F.).]

2. An o. for entropion of the lower lid, in which the external canthus is split and two incisions are made from the ends of the lower wound margin downward, as sides of an equilateral triangle. The skin adjacent to the incision is loosened and drawn together over the opening. 2. The establishment of an anus in the perineum in cases of imperforate rectum, after previous colotomy. A guide is passed into the terminal extremity of the rectum through the artificial opening in the abdomen, and cut down upon from the perineum. The abdominal opening is closed after the perineal opening has been established. [E.]

[F.]—Carter's o. An o. for artificial pupil, in which a small opening is made through the cornea in front of the plane of the iris, and Wecker's scissors are introduced with closed blades, which are permitted to expand as soon as their blunt extremities reach the pupillary area. As the blades expand an escape of aqueous humor lifts a fold of iris between their edges, and this fold is excised as they are closed, and then drawn out of the wound with the scissors. Then the cutting edge is turned toward the iris, and, in withdrawing the knife, the iris is divided transversely, and the incision so made gapes and forms a pupil. [Philos. [E.]—Colley's o. See Davies-Colley's o.—Collis's o. Excision of the tongue by a method like Paget's, except that the sublingual tissues are divided with the écraseur instead of the knife, and the cheek is laid open from below the angle of the mouth, for additional room. [E.]—Cooper's o. Excision of a portion of the membrana tympani for the relief of deafness and tinnitus in chronic aural catarrh. [B.]—Crampton's o. An o. for entropion, in which the lid is divided with scissors vertically for a quarter or half an inch close to its temporal end. A similar incision is made at the nasal end of the lid, avoiding the canaliculus. The eyelid is kept on the stretch away from the eyeball by a broad spatula, and the incisions are allowed to heal by granulation, this tending to do away with the inversion. [F.]—Cripps's o. Dissection of the rectum from the neighboring tissues and excision of the diseased portion. The wound is allowed to heal by granulation. [a, 34].—Critchett's o. 1. Iridodesis in which a small incision is made through the cornea near its margin with a broad needle; the iris is then seized with the cannula-forceps between its ciliary and sphincter margins, and is drawn through a small loop of fine silk for a sufficient distance, then the loop is drawn tight, and the ends are cut off close. In a few days the ligatured piece of iris sloughs off, and the pupil remains dislocated in its new position. [Ophth. Hosp. Rep., i, p. 220 (F)]. 2. An o. for keratoconus, performed with a knife consisting of two Sichel's blades, the backs of which touch, the point of one being a little longer than that of the other, and both being set on one handle. They are hinged together, so that they can be set and fixed at any required angle. The blades being so fixed, the points are made to pierce the cornea at the point of the cone to which the excision is to reach, and, passed steadily on through the anterior chamber, are brought out at the opposite point of the cone, and pushed on until they have cut their way out. An elliptical piece will thus be excised. 3. An o. for staphyloma, in which the eyeball is transfixed behind the ciliary region by two or three semicircular threaded needles. The portion in front of these needles is cut off, the needles are drawn through, and the sutures are tied, so as to unite the gaping wound in a horizontal line. The sutures are passed through the retina, choroid, sclerotic, and conjunctiva. This o. has been almost entirely given up, on account of the danger of producing sympathetic ophthalmia. [F.] 4. An o. for skillicidium lacrimarum, which consists in cutting out a portion of the posterior wall of the canaliculus, thus drawing the canal farther inward toward the caruncle, forming a reservoir into which the tears may run to prevent reunion of the parts. [Lancet, 1863, ii, p. 697 (F)]. 5. A modification of von Graefe's o. for strabismus, consisting in the subconjunctival division of the tendon of the muscle. A hook is introduced beneath the tendon, and the latter is divided by blunt-pointed scissors curved on the flat, one blade being introduced between muscle and conjunctiva and the other between muscle and sclera. [F.]—Davies-Colley's o. The removal of a wedge-shaped piece of the tarsus for talipes, regardless of the articulations. [E.]—Decé's o. The dissection of a fold of skin from the base to the commissure of the web for syndactylism, the fingers being kept apart. The retraction of the tongue of skin by cicatrization forms a new commissure. [a, 34].—Delore's o. See Redressement forcé.—Del Toro's o. An o. for keratoconus, in which, about two weeks after a preliminary iridectomy, the vertex of the conical cornea is destroyed with a very fine knife heated to a white heat. [Crónica oftal., May 12, 1881 (F)].—Denans's o. A method of uniting the serous surfaces of a divided intestine by means of three metallic tubes, one of which is secured within each end, and the third inserted between them as a support. [E.]—Desautel's o. 1. An o. for preternatural anus, which consists in the introduction of a plug into the openings of the two segments of the injured intestine. The middle of the plug should rest upon the spur of hypertrophied mesentery between the two segments, a thread being carried around it and secured externally. By degrees the spur will be obliterated, and the openings of the two segments of intestine brought more and more into apposition. When this has been sufficiently accomplished, the plug is permanently removed, and an external obturator bandage applied. [Guyon (D, 92)]. 2. An o. for stricture of the lacrimal duct, which consists in introducing a thin probe through the sac to the bottom of the nasal duct, and over that a silver tube. The probe is then withdrawn, a long thread carried through this tube to the nose, and its lower end seized and drawn out. To this end are fastened a number of cotton threads, soaked in some astringent or cauterizing fluid, and these are then drawn up into the duct. [Chir. Nachlass., ii, 13 (F)].—Desmarre's o. A form of iridectomy in which the lids are held open with elevators, the eyeball is fixed with a forceps, and a Beer's knife is inserted precisely at the junction of the sclerotic and cornea, and pressed forward into the anterior chamber in a direction parallel to the plane of the iris until an incision about  $\frac{1}{2}$  inch long is made. The knife is then withdrawn, and the cannula forceps introduced and the blades opened. The iris prolapses between them and is lacerated, and the prolapsed part is cut off with scissors. [F.]—De Wecker's o. 1. An o. for artificial pupil, by making a hole in the cornea opposite the point to be incised, introducing De Wecker's scissors, allowing them to expand when they reach the pupillary margin, and then pushing them forward so as to include the iris between their blades. The iris is then divided by closing the blades. 2. An o. for ptosis, in which an oval piece of skin is excised from the lid by an incision parallel to the ciliary margin, and 4 to 5 mm. above it. A needle armed with an antiseptic silk suture is then introduced at a point above the eyebrow, passed downward beneath the skin and orbicular muscle, and brought out at the upper border of the wound below the orbicular muscle. It is again introduced below the orbicular muscle, near the inferior wound, and brought out again in the middle of the bridge of skin. A bridge of 5 to 16 mm. being then formed, the needle is again introduced beneath the skin and muscle, is brought out in the wound, again passes beneath skin and muscle, and is finally brought out through the skin above the eyebrow, 0.5 cm. from the point of entrance. A second similar suture is placed alongside the first, and at a distance of 1 cm. from it. Gentle traction on the ligatures closes the wound, and then the ends of the ligatures are tied over a little roll of kid. [Ann. d'ocul., July-Aug., 1882 (F)]. 3. An o. for retinal detachment, by introducing a loop of very fine gold wire through the sclera and choroid and leaving it in situ, thus providing for a constant draining of the subretinal fluid. 4. See Capsular ADVANCEMENT. 5. Abscission of a corneal staphyloma, a modification of Knapp's o., consisting in dissecting up the conjunctiva from the corneal margin all round and as far back as the equator. Four sutures are then introduced, two on the nasal side and two on the temporal. The staphyloma is split horizontally, and the two halves are removed with scissors close to the corneal margin. The lens is then removed, and the sutures are drawn tight. [Ann. d'ocul., lxi, p. 61 (F)]. 6. Blepharoplasty by a modification of Reverdin's o., applicable in cases of burns of the eyelids or of loss of substance from disease, in which small pieces of true skin (instead of epidermis merely), 6 to 8 mm. in diameter, are employed, covered with gold-beater's skin. [Ann. d'ocul., lxxvii, p. 62 (F)]. 7. Iridotomy for small, central, stationary corneal or lenticular opacities. The eyeball is fixed with forceps close to the corneal margin in the prolongation of that meridian in which the division of the sphincter iridis is to be made. An incision 4 mm. long is made in the cornea midway between centre and periphery, and perpendicular to this meridian. Through this wound the closed forceps-scissors are introduced. At the pupillary margin they are opened, and one blade is passed behind the iris (the other in front), the blades are closed, and the sphincter is thus divided. The gaping of the wound makes a pear-shaped pupil. [F.] 8. Sclerotomy, in which a narrow cataract knife is used, the points of entrance and exit being exactly as in the o. for extraction of cataract. The knife is withdrawn without completing the incision, and the middle undivided portion of sclera prevents the prolapse of the iris. [Ann. d'ocul., lxxvii, p. 182 (F)]. 9. Corneal trephining for glaucoma, in which the ordinary corneal trephine is employed to remove a circular piece from 1 to 1.5 mm. in diameter at the edge of the cornea. The cutting cylindrical blade is inclosed in a tube from which it is made to protrude by pressing a spring. [F.]—Dianoux's o. An o. for entropion, in which Snellen's or De Wecker's lid-clamp is applied, and an incision is made parallel to the free margin of the lid, about 4 mm. from it, extending the whole length of the lid, and penetrating to the tarsus. The ciliary portion of the lid thus marked off is detached from the tarsus by an incision on the intermarginal portion of the lid. An incision through the skin alone is then made about 3 mm. above the first incision, and parallel to it, but extending about 2 mm. beyond it at each extremity. The skin-flap is separated from the underlying muscle, except at the ends. The underlying portion of the muscle is then dissected up from the tarsus and allowed to retract upward. A pair of forceps is then passed beneath the ciliary flap, the skin-flap is seized and drawn down into the position of the former, and made fast by three sutures to the margin of the tarsus. The ciliary flap is drawn up and carefully stretched upon the cartilage bared of the orbicular muscle, the latter is drawn back with a strabismus hook, and the flap is secured in place with sutures to the tarsus. [F.]—Didot's o. An o. for syndactylism, in which an incision is made along the middle of the palmar surface of one finger, reaching from the base to the top of the web, and is joined at each end by transverse incisions which reach to the middle of the opposite finger. The same process is repeated on the dorsum of each finger, except that the flap runs in the opposite direction. After these skin flaps are made, the remaining tissues of the web are divided and the flaps are made to cover the denuded surfaces. [A, 520 (a, 29)].—Dieffenbach's o. 1. See Dieffenbach's CHIELOPLASTY. 2. See Dieffenbach's URANOPLASTY. 3. An o. for ectropion of the lower lid, in which the external canthus is divided horizontally by an incision from 6 to 8 mm. long. Two converging incisions are made downward, and the triangular piece of skin is excised; then for a distance of 8 to 8 mm. from the external canthus the edge of the lid is excised; the sides of the triangular space are united with sutures, which draws the everted lid outward, and the raw surface on the edge of the lid is united to the base of the triangle. 4. An o. for ectropion by excising all the cicatricial tissue by a triangular incision, its apex downward and its base parallel to the lid margin, and then bringing the edges of the adjacent skin together with pins. 5. An o. for ectropion in which any cicatricial tissue present is removed by a triangular incision, the base of which is directed toward the ciliary margin and the apex downward. The incision which forms the base of the triangle is then extended on each side, and the skin forming the sides of the triangular space is dissected up from the subjacent parts for some distance. Then these two lateral edges are brought together into a vertical line and united by sutures, while by the lateral extensions of the incision above they can be fastened to the base of the triangular space formed by the removal of the cicatrix. 6. An o. for ectropion in which an incision is made through the skin and the orbicularis muscle nearly parallel to the edge of the lid, beginning two or three lines from one angle and ending at an equal distance from the other. The small flap of skin thus made is turned up, the lid is divided through to the conjunctiva, and the latter is divided to the extent of the external wound. The external edge of the divided conjunctiva is then drawn into the wound in the skin and united by sutures which pass through the conjunctiva as well as the skin. [Zeiss (F).] 7. An o. for symblepharon, by folding the lid inward and placing the cuticle against the eyeball. A vertical incision along the side of the nose is made from the internal angle of the eye, and another from the external angle to the corresponding border of the orbit. The lid is detached from the globe, the cilia are cut off, and the quadrilateral piece is then turned inside to rest against the margin of the orbit and is secured by sutures which are carried from within outward and vice versa, tied together, and bound by small strips of adhesive plaster. When the wound on the globe is sufficiently cicatrized, the temporary enucleation is removed. The lid is released and carried back to its original position, and there retained by the twisted suture. 8. A form of blepharoplasty on the lower lid, in which all defective or cicatricial tissue in and below the lower lid is removed by excising an equilateral triangle of skin, the base of which is the edge of the lid. The lateral incisions reach from the fossa canina region upward, and their ends are connected by a transverse incision through the palpebral conjunctiva from one canthus to the other. The cicatricial tissue thus circumscribed is to be excised, but only through the skin, so as to avoid dividing the orbicular muscle. An incision is then made from the external canthus outward 6 to 8 mm. longer than the base of the triangle. From the outer end of this incision a second is made downward upon the cheek and parallel to the outer side of the triangle, and of the same length or longer. This flap is carefully dissected free from fat and connective tissue. The surface of the triangular space is cleansed of all coagula, and the flap is laid in this space, so that its inner edge coincides with the inner edge of the triangular space and its base with the edge of the lid. It is fastened in place with sutures, beginning at the inner canthus and following down the nasal side. The conjunctiva is united with the skin. The raw surface from which the flap was taken is covered with vaseline and borated cotton, and allowed to heal by granulation. An o. for stricture of the lacrimal duct, in which the anterior wall of the lacrimal sac is incised, and a thin tube of gold or silver introduced (and even hammered into the duct when the stricture is tight) as a means of dilating the canal and carrying off the tears. It has never proved very satisfactory. A form of excision of the jaw in which the external incision begins in the median line at the free border of the upper lip, extends into the nostril on the affected side, curves around the ala of the nose, runs upward to the inner canthus of the eye, and then follows the lower margin of the orbit out as far as is necessary on the cheek. [E.]—Fischer's o. An o. for stricture of the lacrimal duct identical with Schmalz's, except that a loop of twilled silk is used on the end of a catgut string. [F.]—Flap o. 1. [B.]—Flarer's o. An o. for entropion, in which a broad horn spatula is placed beneath the lower lid, and the lid is put on the stretch; the ciliary margin of the lid is pressed firmly against the spatula, and with a scalpel an incision is made in the intermarginal space between cilia and tarsus, 15 to 2 mm. deep, from the lacrimal punctum to the external canthus, the strip of tissue containing the cilia being thus separated from the tarsus; a transverse incision is made through the skin of the lid, parallel to the ciliary margin and 2 mm. from it, from one end to the other; the strip of tissue thus marked out, containing all the cilia, is cut off with scissors, and the raw surface heals without sutures. [F.]—French's o. An o. for carbuncle the distinctive feature of which is the making of a subcutaneous incision. [E.]—Freund's o. Abdominal hysterectomy for uterine cancer in which the uterus is drawn out of the abdomen, the broad ligaments are tied in three portions, the lowest thread including the uterine artery, and then they and the remaining attachments are divided. The vaginal wound is closed by suturing its edges to the peritoneum above. [a, 34.]—Fricke's o. A form of blepharoplasty on the upper lid, in which an incision is made through the skin from the inner canthus to beyond the outer canthus, parallel to the lid-margin, and as far above it as the linear scar allows. A second similar incision is made above the scar, and the entire scar dissected out. Then the subcutaneous cicatricial bands are divided, and, if necessary, the fascia tarso-orbitalis along the orbital margin. The lid is then brought down into place, and the size of the space to be filled by transplantation is measured. The flap may be taken from the temple, cheek, or forehead, and is usually tongue-shaped or lance-shaped, and 5 to 7 mm. larger in all directions than the space to be filled. The flap is marked out and dissected free as far as its base. The bridge over which it is to be turned or twisted is then simply cut through, or else a narrow piece is excised, in order to make room for the flap. The latter is adapted to the vacant space in the lid, its edges being carefully trimmed. The space from which the flap was taken is then united by dissecting up the edges and uniting them by sutures. Then the apex of the flap is stitched in place, next the upper margin, and finally the lower. Both eyes are then to be bandaged and the patient is kept in bed for some days. The ligature is then tied, and shortens the skin of the lid. A similar ligature is introduced and tied near the outer canthus. A third ligature, between the two, has been added by Ran. These ligatures tend to turn the edge of the lid outward and upward. ["Bull. de la soc. méd. de Poitiers," 1844 (F).]—Arch. of Ophth.," i, 1, p. 176 (F).—Galezowski's o. 1. The needles are turned inward and brought out at the base of the growth. The two ends are then tied in a knot, and thus the apex of the pterygium is turned inward toward the base, is strangulated, and atrophies. 2. fingers. [A, 520 (a, 29).]—Graefe's o's. See Von Graefe's o's.—Green's o. 1. An o. for entropion, in which the lid is everted and held securely by the fingers, and an incision is made through conjunctiva and tarsus from one end of the lid to the other, in a line parallel to and generally about 2 mm. from the openings of the Meibomian ducts. A strip of skin, 1 to 2 mm. wide and tapering to a point at each end, is removed from the lid, its lower boundary being 1½ mm. above the line of the cilia. The orbicular fascia and muscle should be left intact. The suture needle employed is a No. 12 gloves' needle, bent to an arc of about a third of a circle, and is threaded with fine silk. The needle is first introduced a little to the conjunctival side of the row of eyelashes, and is brought out just within the wound made by the excision of the strip of skin; it is then drawn through, inserted again in the wound near its upper margin, and passed deeply backward and upward, so as to graze the front of the tarsus and emerge through the skin of the eyelid 1 cm. or more above its point of entrance. On tying the two ends of the thread together, the skin wound is closed, and the loosened lid margin is at the same time everted and brought into a correct position. [Trans. of the Am. Ophth. Soc., xvi, 1880 (F.).] 2. An o. for readjustment of the levator palpebrae, in which an incision an inch or more long is made through the skin along the upper border of the lid, and the dissection extended through the subcutaneous fatty tissue nearly backward, so as to avoid opening the conjunctival sac. The upper surface of the eyeball is thus reached, and the broad thin tendon of the superior rectus exposed. Between this and the roof of the orbit the tendon of the levator may be found, and three sutures are then passed through the aponeurosis, the muscle, and the tarsus of the lid, drawn tight, and tied. The wound is then closed by simple sutures, with the ends of the deep sutures hanging outside. [Trans. of the Am. Ophth. An o. for strabismus in which a vertical incision is made with scissors in the conjunctiva, midway between the cornea and the caruncle. The conjunctiva is dissected from the sclerotic, and a strabismus hook passed into the wound and beneath the tendon, which is then stretched and divided close to the sclerotic. 2. An o. for inverted cilia, in which a spatula is introduced beneath the lid to protect the eyeball from injury, and a needle, armed at the point with a double silk thread, is introduced on the margin of the eyelid at a point on one side of the group of hairs to be destroyed, and carried vertically upward till it emerges through the skin about two lines above its entrance. It is re-introduced at this second puncture, carried horizontally for a sufficient distance, and again brought out at a third point. Re-introduced at this third puncture, it is carried vertically downward, and made to emerge at the tarsal margin, where the silk is seized and retained. The two ends of the silk are then knotted together, and a subcutaneous loop is formed, which includes the bulbs of the misdirected hairs, and soon destroys them by the inflammation excited. An o. for artificial pupil, by separation of the iris, through the cornea, from its peripheral attachments by means of a curved needle. 2. An o. for symblepharon, in which a suture or ligature was introduced behind a partial adhesion, which did not reach to the fornix. On the ends of this thread weights were fastened, which in the case of the lower lid passed over specially arranged rollers to the forehead. These pulled the adhesion continuously from behind forward and from below upward, and tended to cause its rupture. 3. Another o. for symblepharon, involving the use of simple ligatures and leaden wires. A bundle of silk threads is passed by means of a curved needle with a large eye through the entire thickness of the symblepharon. The needle is cut off, and the bundle of threads allowed to remain for several days. Then they are removed, and a leaden wire introduced in their place. After several weeks this is replaced by a larger wire, and this again by a still larger one, until it is thought that the canal is large enough, and is entirely lined by epithelium. The last wire is then withdrawn, and the tissue in front of the canal divided with the scissors. The lid is thus loosened from its adhesion to the eyeball. [F.] See Cooper's o.—Horn's o. 1. An o. for ectropion of the lower lid adapted to aggravated cases of eversions from burns, in which an incision 2 inches long, down to the periosteum, is made parallel with the orbicularis muscle and at its inferior margin. The whole thickness of the lid is then dissected up from the subjacent bones. From the middle of this incision another is then made, 1 inch long, downward toward the angle of the jaw, and at the end of the latter another of the same length toward the root of the nose. These last two incisions define an angle of skin which is to be dissected up as far as its base, turned into the beginning of the first incision, and united by pins and sutures. [Am. Jour. of the Med. Sci., Nov. 1837 (F.).] 2. Excision of a round portion of the cheek, including the fistulous tract, with a shoemaker's punch, and suture of the external wound for salivary fistula. [a, 34.]—Horn's o. See Horn's cheiloplasty.—Hotz's o. An o. for entropion, in which the skin of the eyebrow is fixed firmly against the orbital margin by an assistant. The centre of the ciliary margin of the lid is then drawn tightly downward, and a horizontal incision is made through the skin and orbicularis muscle across the entire length of the lid, 2 mm. above the level of the canthi. A strip of muscular fibres is excised, 3 mm. wide, from end to end of the lid. Four sutures are then introduced through the skin of the lid, 2 mm. below the border of the incision, passed through the aponeurosis on the upper third of the tarsus and then through the upper cutaneous border, and tied firmly. [Arch. of Ophth., viii, 2 (F.).]—Huguier's o. Colotomy in the right loin. [a, 34.]—Hulke's o. An o. for fistula of the lacrimal gland, in which the two ends of a silk ligature, each armed with a needle, are passed through the external fistulous opening, so as to penetrate the conjunctiva of the upper lid one above the other. Both ends of the ligature are thus brought out in the cul-de-sac, and, being drawn tight, grasp a triangular piece of the upper lid, the apex of which is at the fistula and the base in the conjunctiva. The ends are then cut off, and the fistula soon heals. [F.]—Hunter's o. 1. Ligation of an artery on the cardiac side of an aneurysm, and at some distance from it. [E.] 2. An o. for trichiasis which consists in puncturing the hair bulbs of the inverted lashes with a lance or iris-knife to the depth of an eighth of an inch. When the bleeding has ceased, the dulled end of a darning needle, slightly moistened and dipped in some irritant, is inserted into the puncture, and held there for some moments. The cilia are then pulled out. [F.]—Indian o. See Indian rhinoplasty.—Italian o. See Median cystotomy and Tagliacotian rhinoplasty.—Jacobs's o. An o. for trichiasis which consists in scalping the edge of the lid together with the cilia and their hair bulbs. [F.]—Jaeger's o. 1. An o. for ectropion, which consists in detaching the everted lid from the cheek or superciliary ridge, leaving it connected at the angles only. A triangular portion of the lid is then removed, if deemed advisable. The detached lid is fixed accurately and firmly in contact with the eyeball, and the skin of the cheek drawn up, or the skin of the forehead drawn down toward the eye, and maintained in this position by adhesive plaster, compresses, and a bandage. [Juengken (F.).] 2. An o. for ectropion of the upper lid, in which an incision is made parallel to the edge of the lid and 5 to 7 mm. from it, through its entire thickness from skin to conjunctiva; a knife is introduced through that part of the wound nearest the orbital margin, and all adhesions of the skin to the bone are freely divided; then from the bridge of tissue between the natural and the artificial palpebral fissures a piece of tissue is excised, as long as the difference in length of the two lids; the inner portion of this bridge is united by sutures to the outer portion, which brings the bridge transversely across the globe, and the lid-margin into its normal position. The horizontal incision is then united by sutures. 3. An o. for entropion, in which a horn spatula is introduced beneath the lid, and a slightly curved incision is made through the skin down to the tarsus, beginning near the punctum at the lid-margin, curving slightly upward toward the middle, and then descending toward the external angle at the lid-margin. This piece, together with the cilia and hair bulbs, is then excised, and the raw surface allowed to heal. 4. An o. for trichiasis consisting of the paring away of the edge of the inverted lid, the hair bulbs of the lashes being thus removed as well as the apertures of the Meibomian glands. 5. An o. for trichiasis which consists in removing that portion of the skin under which lie the bulbs of the cilia. A spatula is introduced beneath the lid, and the skin put on the stretch. The skin and orbicular muscle are then divided by a transverse incision parallel to the cilia. The spatula is then withdrawn, the ciliary edge of the wound is seized at one end with forceps, and the outer margin of the lid with all the hair bulbs is dissected off in a narrow strip. [F.]—Jaesche's o. An o. for trichiasis, in which the upper lid is pulled upward and slightly outward, and an incision is made in the conjunctival surface and parallel with it, exactly behind the position of the faultily directed lashes, and this is prolonged somewhat on both sides. Then a piece of skin 5 to 6 mm. wide is removed from the external surface of the lid, of the same length as the incision in the conjunctiva. A knife is then introduced through the conjunctival wound, and pushed along the whole length of the skin at one end, and then carried along the tarsus is connected with the lid at its two ends only. The upper cut surface of this quadrangular segment of the tarsal margin is then drawn upward on the anterior surface of the tarsus by uniting the edges of the space in the skin surface by sutures. [F.]—Jarvis's o. An o. for artificial pupil in which the lower half of the cornea is opened, as in a flap-extraction. The flap is raised, and a pair of curved scissors with one sharp point is introduced, the iris is punctured 1 line from its periphery, the instrument is carried directly upward and 1 line from the original pupil toward the external angle, and the iris is then divided by the scissors. [F.]—Jobert's o. A method of reuniting a divided intestine by invaginating the upper part within the lower in such a manner as to bring the serous surfaces into contact. See also Jobert's suture.—Jones's o. An o. for ectropion, in which the eyelid is loosened from its adhesions by incisions made in such a way that when the eyelid is brought back into its natural position the gap which is left may be closed by sutures. Two straight in-cisions are made from the edge of the lid, converging toward each other, and including the cicatrix between them. The flap is then pressed upward, and the edges of the wound below the apex of the flap are to be united by two twisted sutures. The edges of the flap are then united in their new position by sutures. [F.]—Kehrer's o. An o. for depressed nipples consisting in the excision of a ring of skin, or of two crescentic pieces of skin, surrounding the nipple, so that, in the healing of the denuded surface, the approximation of the internal and external edges of the ring or crescent may so pull upon the skin immediately surrounding the nipple and forming the cup in which it lies as to obliterate this cup and render the nipple accessible to the child. [Lancet, July 6, 1889, p. 12 (a, 50).]

—Key's o. See Key's LITHOTOMY.—Knapp's o. 1. An o. for cleft lobule of the ear, in which the anterior and posterior parts of the cleft lobule are put on the stretch, and a von Graefe's cataract knife or narrow scalpel being thrust through the anterior part near the lower end of the slit, a thin slice of skin is severed along its edge. At the other end of the slit the slice is made a little broader, its end being left connected with the auricle. Then the knife is turned and an incision is made backward, and the detached slice there cut across, thus forming a small flap. The long portion of the slice is then seized with a pair of forceps, and its other end divided by a slightly curved incision. The edges of the wound are then united by three interrupted sutures. [Arch. of Otol., iii, 1 (F).] 2. A combination of simple union and blepharoplasty for coloboma palpebræ. The edges of the coloboma are first freshened and carefully united by sutures. The outer canthus is then divided, and the adjacent skin toward the temple, above or below the canthus, is detached from its base for half an inch or more. The outer portion of the lid is then drawn toward the nose so as to obviate any shortening of the palpebral fissure. A part of the wound in the outer corner may be covered by stitching the conjunctiva and skin together, as in canthoplasty. [Arch. of Ophthalm., v, 1, p. 18 (F).] 3. An o. for strabismus divergens, employed in high degrees of divergent squint for causing the eye to roll inward as far as possible. A suture with two needles is used, one needle being introduced through the conjunctiva, close to the cornea and 3 or 4 mm. above the horizontal meridian, from above downward, and brought out in the horizontal meridian, the other needle being introduced in a corresponding way from below upward. Both needles are then passed through the inner canthus. By drawing on the ligatures and uniting their ends in front of the canthus, the globe is rolled inward. The external rectus must previously be divided in the usual way. 4. Abscission of a corneal staphyloma by removing the entire base of the staphyloma by an elliptical incision in the scleral margin, and then closing the wound by sutures through the conjunctiva instead of through the sclera. Two needles and two long sutures are used. Three mm. above the sclero-corneal margin, and on the nasal side of the vertical meridian, a needle is passed through the conjunctiva, pushed forward close to the sclera for 4 or 5 mm. under the conjunctiva toward the nose, and then brought out. The same needle is then introduced below the cornea into the conjunctiva at a point corresponding to the point above, pushed forward 4 or 5 mm. toward the temple, and again brought out. The two ends of the suture are turned upward and downward, while the intervening free piece is turned toward the nose. In the same manner a suture is introduced through the ocular conjunctiva on the temporal side, and the ends turned back. The ends of the inner and afterward of the outer suture are drawn tight, closing the wound completely. 5. Blepharoplasty on the lower lid by a method adapted for cases of tumors or neoplasms, following the excision of these by rectangular incisions in healthy tissue. The horizontal incisions are extended toward the nose, and a quadrangular flap is dissected up. At the external canthus an incision is made outward, curving slightly upward on the temple. Then the lower margin of the wound is also prolonged outward, curving downward on the side of the cheek. This flap is also dissected up, and after hemorrhage has ceased its vertical margin is united by sutures with the vertical margin of the nasal flap, the two being slid toward each other. The upper and internal angle is then united by a suture to the inner edge of the upper lid. [Arch. f. The wound is then closed, and the joint fixed in a right-angled position. [A, 520 (a, 29).] 5. [A, 520 (a, 29).]—Norton's o. An o. for syndactylism, in which small, rounded anterior and posterior flaps are made at the clefts between the fingers, with their bases opposite the heads of the metacarpal bones; the web is then divided and the flaps are joined. [A, 520 (a, 29).]—Noyes's o. 1. See Cataract LACERATION. 2. An o. for entropion of the lower lid, in which the external canthus is divided for about 3 mm., and the canthal ligaments of both lids are cut; the conjunctiva is loosened from its attachments; a narrow tongue of skin is then formed by making incisions upward toward the temple, just beyond the end of the eyebrow, constructing a small flap with its base below and its apex upward. This is loosened, turned downward, and inserted between the edges of the wound. The wound from which the flap was taken is closed by sutures, and the apex of the flap is stitched in its new position to the conjunctiva. The remaining sutures are then inserted. [Trans. of the Fifth Intern. Congr. of Ophth., 1876 (F).] 3. An o. for staphylocoma corneae by incision of the limbus, as in iridectomy, followed by total avulsion of the iris by a blunt hook or by forceps. 4. Tenotomy on "the elongated tendon of the antagonistic muscle," instead of on the squinting muscle in strabismus. The shortening necessary to correct the squint is made by lapping the ends of the divided tendon, and maintaining them in position by two sutures passed through the conjunctiva and lapped ends of the tendon above and below and tied tightly. [Trans. of the Am. Ophth. Soc., 1874, p. 273 (F).] 5. Blepharoplasty by a bucco-temporal flap; a modification of the o. by sliding flaps, recommended for remedying defects about the inner portion of the lower lid, as in epithelioma. It consists in removing the diseased mass and then sliding the whole cheek, together with the remaining portion of the shortened lid, inward and upward. One of the incisions runs perpendicularly downward in the furrow alongside the nose as far as the ala nasi, and the other is made horizontally outward across the temple toward the ear. [Trans. of the Am. Ophth. Soc., 1879 (F).] 6. Blepharoplasty by a naso-buccal flap, applicable only to the lower lid. The incisions are made down the side of the nose and cheek as far as the upper lip, the free end being below and the base above. When this flap is twisted on its base upward, and laid in position, there is left a large gap in the face, which is filled by sliding the cheek in toward the median line, and uniting the edges by pins and figure-of-8 sutures. [Trans. of the Fifth Intern. Ophth. Congr., 1876 (F).] 7. An o. on dense secondary membranes, in which a narrow knife is entered at the centre of the outer margin of the cornea, passed across the anterior chamber, and brought out at a corresponding point on the opposite side. The knife is then partially withdrawn until its point is opposite the middle of the iris, when it is plunged backward through the false membrane into the vitreous, making the wound as large as possible. The knife is then withdrawn; a small blunt hook passed in through each corneal wound is caught in the wound made in the false membrane, and traction is made in opposite directions, so as to drag out a portion of tissue at each corneal wound, where it is to be snipped off. [Roy. Lond. Ophth. Hosp. Rep., vi, 3, p. 200 (F).]—Nunneley's o. A form of excision of the tongue in which a sharp-pointed curved knife is introduced between the base of the jaw and the hyoid bone, and brought out in the mouth at the frænum. Through this opening a wire écraseur is introduced, so as to surround the tongue. The écraseur is held in place by strong pins passed vertically through the tongue behind the diseased tissue. [E.]—O'Dwyer's o. See INTUBATION of the larynx.—Ogston's o. An o. for genu valgum, in which the internal condyle of the femur is separated from the shaft and slid up until the two condyles are upon the same plane. The tibia may then be swung forward. 2. An o. for talipes valgus, adapted to the most severe cases, in which the surfaces of the astragalo-scapoid articulation are refreshed, and the bones are nailed together in a corrected position. [A, 520 (a, 29).]—Ollier's o. 1. See Ollier's OSTEOTOMY. 2. A form of excision of the elbow joint, in which the incision is commenced two inches above the top of the olecranon at the outer side of the arm, involving the skin, is brought down to the epicondyle and then turned downward and inward to the olecranon, and, carrying the knife to the bone, is carried downward along the inner side of the posterior aspect of the ulna for one or two inches. In other respects this o. resembles Langenbeck's. [A, 520 (a, 29).] 3. A form of excision of the shoulder joint in which an incision is made from the anterior border of the acromion close to its articulation with the clavicle downward from 2 to 4 inches. A cross incision is thus made outward from the top of the longitudinal incision downward and outward. The periosteum is elevated, the head of the bone thrown out of the wound and sawed off, the wound closed, and the arm fixed in position. [A, 520 (a, 29).]—Open o. An o. in which the field of o. is freely exposed to the action of the air. [B.]—O. of election. See Elective o.—Pagenstecher's o. 1. An o. for entropion, in which the external canthus is divided, the horizontal wound is stretched into a vertical one, the opposed surfaces of skin and conjunctiva are united by sutures, the lid is everted, and several ligatures are inserted as follows: the loose skin of the lid and the orbicular muscle are lifted up in a horizontal fold with forceps, and a curved needle armed with strong waxed thread is passed through the base of the fold close to the tarsus; the point of the needle is then brought out at the edge of the lid; the two other ligatures are then inserted, one on each side of the first. All three are tied and left to suppurate out. 2. A modification of Critchett's o. for iridodesis, consisting in making the incision through the sclera with a broad needle or a narrow lance-knife. [Arch. f. Ophth., vi, p. 73; viii, p. 192 (F).] 3. An o. for obliteration of the lacrimal sac, in which the canaliculi are slit up by incisions that meet in front of the crunicle. When hæmorrhage has ceased, a small bit of chloride-of-zinc paste is introduced into the sac and covered with a thick layer of charpie or cotton. This obliterates the sac by adhesive inflammation. 4. An o. for stricture of the lacrimal duct employed in cases of closure of the canaliculi. A No. 3 Bowman's probe is introduced slowly and steadily through the obstruction in the canaliculus into the sac. The canaliculus and the anterior wall of sac are then cut through with scissors, and this wound is kept open as long as necessary by daily passage of a sound.—Paget's o. A form of excision of the tongue like Nunneley's, except that, instead of the submental puncture, the tongue is freed by dividing all the soft parts that hold it to the floor of the mouth, close to the bone, with a knife. [E.]—Panas's o. 1. See Panas's PROCTOTOMY. 2. An o. for ptosis by cutting a quadrangular pedicle out of the skin of the upper lid, carrying this up beneath the skin of the eyebrow and bringing it through an incision made above the latter, where it is attached by sutures. [B.]—Pancoast's o. 1. See Pancoast's AMPUTATION. 2. An o. for extrophy of the bladder, in which two flaps are raised, one from each inguinal region, and brought together in the median line and secured by sutures, the skin being inward. 3. An o. for facial neuralgia by dividing either the superior or inferior maxillary nerve through the zygomatic fossa. Two vertical incisions are made over the ramus of the jaw, the anterior extending from the malar bone, and the posterior from the zygoma almost to the angle of the jaw. These vertical cuts are joined below by a transverse one. The masseter is exposed and dissected up, the coronoid process is sawed off and cut away from the tendon of the temporal muscle, which is pushed up, the internal maxillary artery is tied, the superior origin of the external pterygoid is divided, and the nerve sought for is exposed by dissection. [E.]—Parker's o. 1. Cystotomy through the perineum for the relief of chronic cystitis in the male. [E.] 2. The o. of opening a perityphlitic abscess.—Passavant's o. An o. for corelipsis, which consists in detaching the adhesions by traction with forceps, made in a direction toward the ciliary region. A small incision is made in the sclero-corneal region, on the same side as the adhesion. An iris forceps without sharp teeth is then introduced, and a fold of iris seized behind the adhesion and drawn toward the wound. As soon as the adhesion yields, traction is stopped, and atropine at once instilled. [F.]—Petit's o. An o. for stricture of the lacrymal sac, consisting in laying open the anterior wall of the sac with a bistoury or scalpel by making an incision through the skin and wall of the sac just below the internal canthal ligament. At first the incision was semilunar, with the convexity toward the bony prominence; but subsequently Petit made a straight incision downward. This o. had previously been recommended by Stahl and Monro. [Mém. de l'Acad. des Sci., 1734, 1740 (F).]—Pétriquin's o. An o. for symblepharon, in which a double thread is passed at one spot through the adhesions, one strand is tied close to the sclerotic with great firmness, and the outer is tied less firmly at a point nearer the lid. The strangulation and sloughing occurring earlier at the constriction next the eyeball, that part heals before the other, and the cicatrization becomes too advanced to admit of a new adhesion with the outer part. [Ann. d'ocul., iii, p. 66 (F).]—Phelp's o. An o. for the relief of club-foot, in which the skin of the inner side of the foot is divided from the top of the malleolus to the inner edge of the first metacarpal bone; the other tissues are cut, including the insertion of the tibialis tendon. The plantar fascia is then divided, and the foot is brought into a normal position and placed in plaster of Paris. [a. 34.]—Pirogoff's o. See Pirogoff's AMPUTATION.—Plastic o. An o. that has for its object the construction of absent parts, or the replacement or removal of deformed parts. [a. 34.]—Politzer's o. 1. For artificial aperture of the membrana tympani; a crucial incision of the membrane, and the application of nitrate of silver to the edges of the flaps. The galvanic cautery is now used for the purpose. [a. 34.] 2. For atrophied membrana tympani and otitis media catarrhalis; an o. which consists in the repeated incision of the tissue of the membrana tympani by means of a double edged paracentesis needle, midway between the handle of the malleus and the periphery of the membrane. The o. should be performed four or five times, at intervals of two or three days. [F.] 3. Section of the anterior ligament of the malleus done with a small, narrow, slightly curved knife, cutting at its point and at its concave edge. This is inserted (after dividing the anterior fold of the membrana tympani to the depth of 2 mm. toward the tympanic cavity) close in front of the short process, and the ligament is divided by an incision made upward to the Rivinian segment. [F.]—Pope's o. 1. An o. for artificial pupil, which consists in excising a portion of the iris without dividing the sphincter pupillae. An incision is made with a long, narrow lance-knife in the sclera or sclero-corneal margin, and the aqueous humor is gradually evacuated. The iris is then seized behind the most transparent part of the cornea with a fine forceps, drawn out of the small wound, and cut off, the sphincter being carefully avoided. [Arch. of Ophth., ii, p. 87 (F).] 2. An o. for entropion by extirpation of the tarsus, in which an incision is made in the posterior flap along its free margin between the tarsus and the conjunctiva, and the latter is carefully dissected up. The tarsus is then removed piecemeal. After completion of the dissection there remains only the upper rim of the tarsus, which is beveled off from above downward and backward. [Arch. of Ophth., i, p. 10 (F).]—Porro-Müller o. A modification of Porro's o. (see Cæsarean HYSTERECTOMY) in which the uterus is drawn out of the body through a long abdominal incision before it is opened. [F.]—Porro's o. See Cæsarean HYSTERECTOMY.—Post's o. See Post's RHINOPLASTY.—Pouteau's o. An o. for stricture of the lacrymal duct; a modification of Petit's o. which consists in making the incision inside the internal canthus through the conjunctiva and the wall of the sac, between the caruncle and the lower lid. [F.]—Power's o. An o. for leucoma of the cornea which consists in removing a portion of the opaque cornea, with a sharp punch, obtaining by the same means an exactly corresponding portion of a healthy rabbit's cornea, and transferring it to the space in the human eye. The lids are then to be sutured together until union has occurred. [Med. Times and Gaz., Aug. 10, 1872 (F).]—Prévôt's o. Removal of the uterus and the ovaries by laparotomy on account of rupture of the uterus. [F.]—Quaglin's o. A form of sclerotomy, in which an incision is made in the scleral margin with a broad lance-knife, and prolapse of the iris. If it threatens to occur, is prevented with a small spatula. [Ann. d'otol., 1871, p. 200 (F).]—Randohr's o. An o. for uniting a divided intestine by inserting the proximal within the distal end and suturing. [a. 34.]—Rau's o. An o. for artificial pupil, in which an incision is made at the margin of the cornea with a narrow knife, and at the same time the iris is perforated. A hook is introduced through the cornea and through the hole in the iris into the posterior chamber as far as the point where the artificial pupil is desired. The iris is then seized from behind, drawn out through the wound, and cut off. [Arch. f. Ophth., i, p. 189 (F).]—Ravaton's o. See Ravaton's AMPUTATION.—Récamier's o. Vaginal hysterectomy. Nicoletis, Thèse de Paris (Bull. gén. de thérap., Sept. 30, 1887, p. 298).]—Reeves's o. See Reeves's OSTOMY.—Regnoll's o. A form of excision of the tongue, in which the external incision is made from the hyoid bone to the chin, and two lateral cuts are made from the anterior extremity of the first incision, along the lower border of the jaw, dividing through to the mouth all the tissues that connect the tongue with the lower jaw at the symphysis. [F.]—Reverdin's o. An o. for symblepharon, which consists in detaching the lid, and then covering the raw surface on the globe with small pieces of skin or buccal mucous membrane. 2. A form of blepharoplasty, which consists in removing all cicatricial tissue and bringing the lid into its proper position, where it is maintained by stitching it to the other lid. Then, as soon as granulations appear upon the raw surface, this surface is to be covered with small bits of epidermis, kept in place by strips of adhesive plaster. [Gaz. méd. de Paris, 1886, No. 25 (F).]—Reybard's o. A procedure for securing the union of a divided intestine by invaginating the upper end into the lower one with the aid of two sutures; the latter are first attached opposite each other above the wound, and then passed through the lower portion, when, by traction, the invagination is accomplished and the sutures are tied. [Morris (A. 63).]—Richards's o. An o. for extrophy of the bladder, resembling Roux's o., except that the abdominal flap is turned down with the skin inward, and its raw surface covered with the serosal flap. [F.]—Richet's o. An o. for ectropion of the lower lid from caries, in which the cicatrix is excised by three curved incisions, the first made beneath it along the orbital margin and the second above the scar, while the temporal ends of both these incisions are united by the third curved incision. The lid is then replaced in its normal position. The edges of the two lids are next united by a provisional tarsorrhaphy. The third incision is then extended toward the cheek in one direction and on the upper lid in the other direction, thus forming a flap with the first incision. From the point of union between its lower and middle thirds a slightly curved incision is made upward toward the temple. This forms a flap which is intended to be transplanted into the vacant space. By drawing upward the lower flap the defect in the temple is filled in. The parts are then united by numerous fine sutures. [Meyer (F).]—Richter's o. An o. for stricture of the lacrymal duct, consisting in opening the sac and introducing catgut bougies or strings of different sizes successively into the duct, and allowing them to swell by absorption of moisture, and thus dilate the canal. [F.]—Robertson's o. An o. for ectropion of the lower lid, in which the entire thickness of the lid is perforated at a point 1 line from its ciliary margin and  $\frac{1}{2}$  inch to the outer side of the centre of the lid, by a long curved needle, to which is attached a waxed silk ligature, 15 inches long. This ligature is armed with a similar needle at the other end. The first needle, having been drawn through the lid, is passed directly downward, over the conjunctival surface of the lid, till it meets the fold of transmission, through which it is thrust and pushed steadily downward under the skin of the cheek, until a point is reached about 1 or  $\frac{1}{2}$  inch below the edge of the lid, when the needle is caused to emerge and the ligature is pulled through. The other needle is in like manner thrust through the edge of the lid at a corresponding point  $\frac{1}{2}$  of an inch to the inner side of the middle of the lid, then passed over the conjunctival surface of the lid, through the fold of transmission, and downward under the skin till the point emerges at a spot  $\frac{1}{2}$  inch inward from the point of emergence of the first needle. The ligature is kept slack enough to permit of the introduction under the loops that pass over the conjunctival surface of a piece of sheet lead 1 inch long and  $\frac{1}{2}$  inch broad, with rounded extremities and its cut margins smoothed. This piece of lead should be bent with the fingers to a curvature corresponding to that of the eyeball. Then a piece of fine india-rubber tubing is slipped under the loop at the edge of the lid. The free ends of the ligature are then drawn tight and tied over the lower part of the rubber tube, and the excess of the latter is cut off below the ligature. By this procedure the edge of the lid is turned inward over the upper edge of the piece of lead, while the tarsus is caused to mold itself to the curve of the lead. The apparatus need not be removed for 5 to 7 days. [Ophth. Rev., Feb., 1884 (F).]—Roonhuysen's o. See Horn's CHEILOPLASTY.—Roux-Sédillot o. A form of excision of the tongue, which consists in making a vertical incision in the median line and a transverse incision along the jaw. The scrotal flap is turned with its cutaneous surface inward, and attached above to the abdominal flap. [F.]—Scarpa's o. 1. An o. for stricture of the lacrymal duct, in which the anterior wall of the lacrymal sac is incised, the sac opened, and a leaden style or cylinder, somewhat curved and with a small knob or plate at the upper end, is introduced into the duct and pushed to the bottom. This is allowed to remain for some time. 2. A form of iridodialysis, which consisted in introducing Scarpa's slender, curved cataract needle into the eye, 2 lines behind the corneal margin on the temporal side, behind the iris, until its point had reached the upper and internal part of the ciliary margin, which was then perforated. The needle was then carried downward and outward, so as to detach a portion of the iris. [F.]—Schede's o. See Schede's OSTOMY.—Schmalz's o. An o. (soon abandoned) for stricture of the lacrymal duct, which consisted in the introduction of stout double silk threads, twisted and waxed, into the sac, and as far down through the nasal duct as possible. [B.]—Sims's o. See Sims's CHOLECYSTOMY.—Smith's o. 1. See Smith's AMPUTATION. 2. Seizure of a hemorrhoidal mass in a special clamp, excision of the mass, and cauterization of the stump. [a. 34.]—Snellen's o. 1. An o. for ectropion of the lower lid; an attempt to replace the everted tarsus without any external incision. At two or three points along the prolapsed and thickened retro-tarsal fold a suture armed with two needles is introduced, passed behind the lid, and brought out through the skin close to the orbital margin. Small glass beads are then passed over the needles upon the threads, and the sutures are then drawn tight and tied. [Klin. Monatsbl. f. Augenheilk., Jan., 1882 (F).] 2. An o. for entropion, in which the lid is everted, and two needles attached to the ends of a silk ligature are passed from within outward through the whole thickness of the lid, so that one needle pierces the upper margin of the tarsus and the other passes a little above it. The needles are then re-introduced at the points of exit, passed down to the interior surface of the tarsus and along it, beneath the orbicularis, toward the edge of the lid, and brought out in front of the cilia close to each other. The upper edge of the tarsus is thus inclosed in a sling, and by tying the ligatures near the ciliary border the edge of the lid is everted. ["Congr. d'ophthal.," 1892, p. 236 (F).] 3. An o. for entropion, in which the lid is fixed with a blepharostat; parallel to the ciliary margin and 3 mm. above it, an incision is made through the skin for the entire length of the lid; the skin is then dissected up both sides, and a piece of the orbicular muscle, about 2 mm. wide, is excised; the skin and muscle are then pushed upward, and a wedge-shaped piece cut out of the tarsus throughout its whole length. Three sutures, each armed with two needles, are then passed through the middle and both ends of the wound in the tarsus, near its upper margin, in such a way that the loops are upward. The two ends of each suture are then passed beneath the skin of the lid margin and brought out on the margin just above the line of the lashes. They are then drawn tight and tied. The closing of the wound in the skin of the lid is not necessary. The edge of the lid is thus drawn outward and upward. ["Klin. Monatsbl.," 1892, p. 34 (F).] 4. An o. for trichiasis, in which the two free ends of a silk thread are drawn through the eye of a curved needle, so that a sling is formed on the other side. The point of the needle is inserted in the free margin of the lid, as close as possible to the misplaced eyelash, and is brought out in a line with the normal cilia, at the external part of the lid about a line from its margin. The faulty eyelash is then placed in the sling by the aid of forceps, and the two drawn completely through, so that the lash lies in the tract of the needle wound. [F.]—Spence's o. See Wharton's AMPUTATION and Spence's AMPUTATION.—Sperrin's o. An o. for cataract by paracentesis, based on the theory that the impairment of vision in cataract is partly dependent on a temporary disturbance in the intra-ocular circulation and partly on opacity of the lens. It consists in making a small puncture with a broad needle at the edge of the cornea or slightly in the sclerotic. A blunt probe is then inserted between the lips of the wound, and the aqueous humor slowly evacuated. The evacuations by the same opening may be made repeatedly during a single sitting, followed by an interval of several days, or singly at an interval of a day or two. They must be repeated many times. ["Ophth. Rev.," ii, p. 234 (F).]—Steino's (Ger.). [B.]—Stilling's o. An o. for stricture of the lacrimal duct, in which the punctum and canaliculus are incised, and a probe is passed down into the duct to find the exact seat of the stricture. The probe is then withdrawn, and the stricture is divided in three or four directions with Stilling's knife. A large probe is passed at intervals to prevent reunion. [F.]—Stokes's o. 1. See Stokes's AMPUTATION. 2. The removal of a wedge from the inner side of the neck of the astragalus for talipes valgus. [A, 520 (a, 20).]—Streetfield's o. 1. An o. for atresia of the punctum lacrimale, in which the normal punctum and canaliculus are divided, and a fine director, suitably bent, is passed by this aperture into the other canaliculus, and, if possible, through the obliterated punctum. If this can not be done, the canaliculus can readily be laid open upon it. ["Roy. Lond. Ophth. Hosp. Rep.," iii, 4 (F).] 2. An o. for corelipsis, consisting in making a puncture with a cutting needle through the cornea, midway between centre and margin, and at a point opposite the adhesion to be detached. The needle should be withdrawn without loss of aqueous humor. The corelipsis hook, a fine and narrow spatula with a notch on one side, is introduced through the puncture, and carried between the iris and the lens. The adhesion is engaged in its notch, and broken or cut by traction across the pupil toward the puncture. 3. An o. for entropion, in which an incision is made transversely through the skin from one end of the lid to the other, parallel to the lid margin, and 2 mm. above it; the lips of the wound are then widened, the orbicularis fibres are pushed aside, and a wedge-shaped piece, with the base 2 mm. wide and directed forward and the apex backward, is cut out of the tarsus, throughout the entire length of the lid; the wound is then united by deep sutures. ["Roy. Lond. Ophth. Hosp. Rep.," 1858, p. 121 (F).] 4. An o. for secondary cataract, in which two needle-hooks are employed, made of two cataract needles bent at their ends into two small hooks. The hook part is  $\frac{3}{16}$  ctm. in extent. The sharp parts of the hooks are placed one on each side of the cornea near its margin, are pressed through the cornea into the anterior chamber, and are then turned down into the membranous septum and drawn slowly in opposite directions. Cong.," 1872 (F).]—Subcutaneous o. An o. in which either there is no external wound or the external wound is made at a distance from the seat of o. and in such a way as not to expose the field of o. to the action of the air. A form of excision of the tongue, in which the lower lip and jaw are divided in the median line to give room for reaching the whole organ. [E.]—Szymanowsky's o. 1. An o. for ectropion of the lower lid, which consists in excising a triangular piece of skin at the external canthus by an incision made from the external canthus upward and outward until the upper end lies 8 mm. higher than the canthus, by an incision similar but twice as long, made downward and outward from the canthus, and by a vertical incision uniting the ends of the other two. The flap of skin being removed, the outer end of the lower lid is dissected up, and the ciliary margin, with the lashes, removed for a certain distance. The lid is then drawn up and replaced in position, and the parts maintained in apposition by sutures. 2. A form of blepharoplasty by a modification of the canthotemporal and temporo-genal incisions. The first of these is made obliquely upward and outward, the second obliquely downward and inward. This admits, after the transplantation of the flap into place, of the insertion of sutures at the external canthus so as to prevent the sinking of the flap. An o. for lacrimal stricture, in which the lower canaliculus is slit as far as its opening into the sac, and probes of different sizes, with olive-shaped ends, are introduced into the duct. ["Med. Times and Gaz.," Jan., 1860 (F).] 3. An o. for symblepharon, in which an incision is made through the adherent lid in a line corresponding to the margin of the concealed cornea, and the lid is then dissected from the eyeball until the latter moves freely. Then a flap of conjunctiva,  $\frac{1}{2}$  by  $\frac{1}{2}$  inch, is marked out, with its base at the sound conjunctiva bounding the inner extremity of the raw surface, and its apex passing toward the upper surface of the eyeball. This flap is then dissected from the globe, until it can be stretched across the chasm without great tension, care being taken to leave a sufficient thickness of tissue near its base. A second flap is made on the outside of the eyeball in the same manner. The inner flap is stretched across the raw surface of the eyelid, being fixed by its apex to the healthy conjunctiva at the outer edge of the wound. The outer flap is fixed across the raw surface of the eyeball, its apex being stitched to the conjunctiva near the base of the inner flap. After the two flaps are thus dovetailed into the wound, if there is any undue tension the conjunctiva may be incised in any direction near their base. There is another form applicable only to the lower lid. The lid is separated from the corneal margin backward as far as the retrolateral fold. A band-shaped strip of ocular conjunctiva, 2 to 3 mm. wide, is dissected up from the globe above the cornea, and left attached at either end. This is then brought down over the cornea and made to fill up the raw surface on the globe where the lower lid was adherent to it, and is held in place by fine sutures. ["Roy. Lond. Ophth. Hosp. [Guyon (D, 72).]—Vermale's o. See Vermale's AMPUTATION.—Vernueil's o. See Vernueil's PROCTOTOMY and Vernueil's PROCTOPLASTY.—Von Ammon's o. 1. An o. for cicatricial ectropion, in which the integument to the distance of an inch from the place of adhesion being put on the stretch, so that the adhesion of the lid to the orbit is brought completely into view, an incision is made parallel to the edge of the orbit and about  $\frac{1}{2}$  inch from it, somewhat longer than the adhesion. From the ends of this incision two smaller incisions are carried to the edge of the orbit. The flap thus circumscribed is dissected up, care being taken to avoid wounding the canaliculi or cutting through the adhesion. The sutures are then applied, and the raw space is left to granulate. ["Ztschr. f. Ophth.," i, p. 47 (F).] 2. An o. for destruction of the lacrimal sac, which consists in opening and excising a portion of the anterior wall of the sac, taking care to avoid cutting the muscular fibres in the vicinity. This sets up an adhesive inflammation which closes the orifice of the sac. ["Ann. d'ocul.," xxvii, p. 32 (F).] 3. An o. for ectropion from caries applicable for eversion with adhesion of the cicatrix to the outer surface of the edge of the orbit. The deeply depressed cicatrix is surrounded by an incision, leaving it adherent to the bone, and the neighboring integument all round is detached, the lid set at liberty, and the eyelids closed. The external wound is then closed over the cicatrix. ["Ztschr. f. Ophth.," i, 49 (F).] 4. An o. for symblepharon (suitable only for narrow adhesions), in which, by two converging incisions through the entire thickness of the lid from lid margin to orbital margin, the lid is divided into two lateral movable portions and a central wedge-shaped adherent portion. The fresh edges of the lateral portions are then brought together in front of the central adherent wedge, and united by firm sutures. When the line of adhesion between these portions has become firm, the wedge-shaped piece is detached from the eyeball and the conjunctival cul-de-sac. ["Ztschr. f. Augenheilk.," iii, p. 235 (F).] 5. A form of blepharoplasty (more applicable to the lower lid than to the upper), in which all the cicatricial tissue is removed, and the remains of the lid liberated by incisions. This usually leaves a triangular space with the base parallel to the tarsal edge of the lid. An incision is then carried in the same direction with the base from its external angle toward the zygoma, while from the end of this another incision is continued downward and forward toward the apex of the triangle. The flap thus marked out is raised from the subjacent parts, except at its lower portion, and moved into the space to be filled up, where it is secured by sutures. The space left by its removal is treated as an open wound. [F.]—Von Burow's o. An o. for entropion, in which the tarsus near its outer end a line or more from the cilia, and carried along between the tarsus and the muscle from the outer to the inner end. If the tarsus is much thickened, a wedge-shaped piece is cut from the upper side of the incision. A narrow strip of skin is then excised from the length of the lid, sutures are inserted in the skin, and the external wound is closed. ["Berl. klin. Wehnschr.," 1873, 24 (F).]

Von Graefe's o. 1. See German RHINOPLASTY. 2. An o. for dacryops in which a fine thread, armed with a curved needle, is passed through the aperture of the duct, and carried along the anterior wall of the cyst to a distance of about 2 mm., at which point it is again brought out, so that a bridge of the anterior cyst wall is included within the thread, which is tied in a loose loop. The intermediate bridge may either be allowed to slough through or may be divided after a few days. ["Arch. f. Ophth.," vii, 2, p. 2 (F).]

3. An o. for ectropion of the lower lid, in which a wedge-shaped portion of the eyelid is cut out, and the edges of the wound united by means of the hare-lip suture; but before the thread is twisted round the pins the skin of the cheek is divided, to the extent of 1½ inch, by an incision concentric with the edge of the orbit. The threads are then twisted, and their ends drawn upward and fixed to the forehead by adhesive plaster, so that the edge of the lower lid may be raised sufficiently. 4. An o. in which the lid is split in the intermarginal line into two leaves, anterior and posterior, from the lower lacrymal punctum to the external canthus. From the ends of this incision two vertical incisions, from 17 to 21 mm. long, are made through skin and muscle down upon the cheek, and the circumscribed quadrilateral flap is dissected up. The upper edge of this flap is then drawn strongly upward toward the forehead, and held in this position until the vertical incisions have been reunited in their new position by sutures. The upper angles of the flap, which are now much too high, are cut off by a bent incision, and securely attached to their proper position by sutures. The horizontal intermarginal wound is finally united by sutures, which are drawn up and fastened to the forehead by plaster. ["Archiv f. Ophth.," x, 2, 228 (F).]

5. An o. for entropion, in which two vertical sections, 4 mm. long, are made, extending from the anterior lid margin upward through the skin and orbicularis muscle, and limiting laterally the part to be transplanted. Then the lid is split vertically into an anterior and a posterior leaf, and the cutaneous leaf is stitched 2 mm. higher up along the vertical incisions. In order to lift the cutaneous leaf with the hair bulbs away from the posterior lid margin, an oval piece of skin may be removed above, or two or three upward-drawing sutures may be introduced. 6. An o. for entropion, in which a horizontal incision is made through the skin of the upper lid parallel to the ciliary margin, and a triangular piece of skin, base downward, is cut out. A horizontal incision is then made through the fibres of the orbicular muscle close to the edge of the lid, and the muscle pushed aside so as to expose the tarsus. A triangular portion of the latter is then excised, with the base upward and close to the upper edge of the tarsus, and the apex downward close to the margin of the lid. Three horizontal sutures are introduced so as to close the wound in the skin, the middle one passing through the edges of the incision in the tarsus. 7. A radical o. for fistula of the lacrymal gland, consisting in extirpation of the gland. ["Arch. f. Ophth.," viii, 1, p. 279 (F).]

8. An o. for ptosis, in which an incision is made in the skin of the upper lid from end to end, parallel to the margin and 5 to 6 mm. above it. The orbicularis is laid bare by slight dissection and forcing apart of the edges of the wound. The muscular fibres are then in part excised with forceps and scissors along the whole length of the wound and for a width of 4 to 5 mm., and the central part of the muscle wound united by three sutures, which also close the wound in the skin. The ends of the wound in the skin are then closed by additional sutures. ["Arch. f. Ophth.," ix, 2, p. 57 (F).]

9. An o. for retinal detachment, in which a double-edged cutting needle is introduced through the sclerotic 4 to 5 lines from the edge of the cornea, and in the meridian corresponding to the prominent part of the detachment. The needle is placed perpendicularly behind the lens into the vitreous chamber for about 6 lines, and then by a simple lever movement of the handle the retina is incised. ["Arch. f. Ophth.," ix, 2, p. 85 (F).]

10. An o. for staphylocoma of the cornea, which consists in passing a stout double ligature, in a direction parallel to the cornea, through the coats of the eyeball and vitreous humor, so as to include them within a suture to an extent of 4 or 5 lines. The threads are to be left loosely tied, and the ends cut off short. This sets up purulent panophthalmitis, and the ligature is then to be removed. ["Arch. f. Ophth.," ix, 2, p. 105 (F).]

11. An o. for shortening the lower eyelid for prolapse, in which, 3 mm. below the anterior lid margin and parallel with it, an incision as long as the tarsus is made through the skin. From the ends of the middle third of this incision two incisions are made which converge toward the orbital margin, and the triangular piece of skin included between them is excised. The skin is then dissected up on both sides, and the wound closed in a vertical direction by sutures. ["Arch. f. Ophth.," x, 2, p. 223 (F).]

Voro's (Ger.). A preliminary o.—Walsham and Willett's o. An o. for talipes calcaneus, in which the tendo Achillis is divided obliquely from above downward and from before backward, and the cut ends are slid past each other until the desired shortening is effected, and are very firmly stitched together in that position with catgut or kangaroo tendon. Several sutures are also taken through the skin, uniting it to the tendon. ["A. 520 (a, 20)."]

Walton's o. An o. for lacrymal stricture, which consists in slitting the upper canaliculus as far as the sac, and then introducing pure silver pins or styles through the sac into the duct, where they are allowed to remain for a varying period. ["Brit. Med. Jour.," Apr., 1863 (F).]

Wardrop's o. 1. An o. for entropion, which consists in shortening the skin of the lid by a ligature introduced for a distance of 2 cm. under the skin of the lid and tied tightly, incising a fold of skin in the night. ["F.," 2. An o. for aneurysm, in which a ligature is applied to one branch of an artery affected with aneurysm so as to diminish the force of the circulation in the aneurysm. [Gross (a, 34).]

Watson's o. An o. for trichiasis, in which a strip of skin containing the inverted lashes is dissected up in the form of a long flap, while a flap similar in shape, but running in the opposite direction, is dissected from the skin above the first flap. Then the two flaps are slid past each other so as to change places, and are secured in their new position by sutures. [B.]—Weber's o. 1. A modification of Bowman's o. for lacrymal stricture. The upper canaliculus is slit with a Weber's knife passed into the sac, the canthal ligament is divided from the inside subcutaneously, and a conical silver sound is passed through the stricture, followed by the introduction of catgut elastic bougies, to effect dilatation. Subsequently bougies of lamina were used, which were introduced and allowed to swell, and thus dilated the canal. ["Klin. Mon.," 1865, p. 110 (F).]

2. An o. for secondary cataract, in which a two-edged, lance-shaped knife, 4 mm. wide, is plunged through the cornea and obstructing membrane on the temporal side, passed behind the obstruction, and brought out on the nasal side. Then, with a pair of Wecker's forceps-scissors, the membrane is cut through above and below, and a quadrilateral piece excised. [F.]—Wells's o. 1. See Wells's CHOLECYSTOTOMY. 2. An o. for entropion, in which the edge of the lid is split into an anterior and a posterior leaf; a fold of skin is excised as in Arlt's o. for trichiasis, and a longitudinal incision is made through the fibres of the orbicular muscle so as to lay bare the tarsus, from which a wedge-shaped piece is cut as in Streetfield's o. The wound is then united by deep sutures, which include the muscular fibres. 3. A slight modification of von Graefe's o. for strabismus. The conjunctiva is divided with straight blunt-pointed scissors, and then, after the hook has been pushed under the tendon, instead of pushing off the conjunctiva, the tendon is divided subconjunctively, and close to its insertion. 4. A form of blepharoplasty on the upper lid, in which the cicatrix is included between the horizontal incisions which converge at the nasal side, but diverge and descend somewhat at the temple. The diseased portion of lid is dissected away from the subjacent tissue, and the lid drawn into its normal position. A corresponding flap to fill the vacant space is dissected from the temple, twisted upon its base, fitted into the wound, and fastened there by suture. [F.]—Wenzel's o. An o. for artificial pupil which consists in piercing the cornea with a cataract knife, plunging it through the iris between its temporal edge and the contracted pupil, and carrying the knife onward, both iris and cornea being divided at once. A small pair of scissors is then introduced through the corneal incision, and the flap of iris is cut off. Then with a small sharp spoon the soft, spongy, vascular, infiltrated tissue of the sclera is removed, until healthy tissue is reached. Iced compresses are then applied, and an antiseptic bandage. ["Ctrbl. f. pract. Augenheilk.," Oct., 1880 (F).]

Wilde's o. 1. An o. for trichiasis applicable where only two or three cilia are turned in. A horn spatula is placed beneath the lid, and an incision is made with a small knife down to the roots of the inverted lashes. When hæmorrhage has ceased, a point of silver nitrate is to be applied to the bottom of the wound, and then the lash or lashes are removed. ["Dublin Jour. of Med. Sci.," 1844 (F).]

2. See Wilde's INCISION.—Williams's o. An o. for lacrymal stricture, similar to Walton's o., except that silver styles or probes of a considerable size are used, or for dense strictures silver probes 2 mm. in diameter at the end but increasing to 5 mm. at 7 or 8 mm. from the end. ["Arch. of Ophth.," i, 1, p. 78 (F).]

The section of the tarsus passes through the middle of the cuboid and scaphoid bones. [Skifossowsky, "Rev. de chir.," Dec., 1884, p. 952.]

Wolfe's o. 1. An o. for retinal detachment, in which a vertical slit is made with scissors in the conjunctiva and subconjunctival tissue, laying bare the sclera at a point corresponding to the side of the detachment. The lips of the wound are separated by two small strabismus hooks, and the sclerotomy is introduced obliquely into the sac formed by the fluid, so that the edges of the sclera wound overlap. Gentle pressure is made on the eyeball with a fine spatula, in the track of the receding lance. The lips of the conjunctival wound are united by a fine silk suture, and both eyes are bandaged. ["Practitioner," March, 1883 (F).]

2. An o. for symblepharon, which consists in the transplantation of the conjunctiva of the rabbit. The adhesions of the lid are divided so that the eyeball is freely movable. The external canthus of the rabbit is divided and ligatures are introduced into its conjunctiva, to mark the extent of the membrane to be removed. By means of the ligatures it is put on the stretch, and dissected out with strabismus scissors. The membrane is spread out to dry. The flap is cleansed and trimmed, slightly moistened, and removed to its new position, care being taken to keep the epithelial surface outward. It is then stitched to the free border of the lid (which is at the same time strongly everted), spread out, and secured at the cul-de-sac by ligatures, which are left in from 4 to 6 days. The portion of rabbit's conjunctiva chosen for transplantation, on account of its vascularity and looseness, is that which lines the inner canthus, covers the membrana nictitans, and extends as far as the cornea. ["Lancet," Apr. 8, 1878 (F).]

3. An o. for tympanic granulations, which consists in scraping off the proliferations from the promontory or from the accessible inferior or posterior wall of the tympanum, by means of small, sharp spoons of various shapes. 4. A form of blepharoplasty, consisting in transplantation of a flap without a pedicle, without cutting away any cicatricial tissue in the skin. A horizontal incision is made through the skin of the lid, parallel to the ciliary region and 2 lines from it, and the cicatricial skin dissected up all round. The cicatricial subcutaneous tissue is then pared away till a clean surface is made. Then the two lids are fastened together at their ciliary margins by sutures. A flap of skin, somewhat larger than the space to be filled, is marked out on the chest or forearm where the skin is thin, and excised, and carefully freed from all areolar tissue by sharp scissors curved on the flat. It is then transferred to the lid and molded into position. No sutures are applied to keep it in place, for fear of suppuration. Lint soaked in hot water is held upon the flap for five or ten minutes, and then a few other pieces of lint or borated cotton wrung out in hot water are laid upon the flap, and the whole covered and secured by an immovable bandage. Carbolic-acid solutions should not be employed. The eye should not be disturbed for three days, after which the dressing should be carefully removed, the parts cleansed with hot water, and then the same dressing reapplied and changed every day. The lids should not be severed for six weeks, and then only partially at first. ["Practitioner," Dec., 1882 (F.).]—Wood's o. 1. The two wooden instruments are held together by a needle (inclosed in the cylindrical one, and made to pass through the internal ring and external tissues) and a screw. [F.]—Coccius's o. An o. consisting of a bi-refracting crystal and a very fine dichroscope, the angle of deviation of which is accurately known. As an object, two lamps, movable along a graduated scale, are used, the reflection images of which are observed on the cornea of the eye through the double spar. [Graefe and Saemisch (F.).]—Helmholtz's o. An instrument consisting of two exactly similar plane-glass plates, standing the one over the other. If these are perpendicular to the line of union between the object and the macula of the eye examined, they exert no influence on the course of the rays of light; but if they are rotated on an axis perpendicular to this line, in the opposite direction, every ray on entering the first plate is deflected toward the perpendicular, and on its exit is deflected equally away from the perpendicular. The same result occurs in the second plate, but toward the other side. Thus two rays enter the eye from every object, which the eye therefore sees double. The distance of the double images is dependent on the index of refraction, on the thickness of the plates, and on the angle of incidence or rotation. If the first two are known, then, in order to find the diameter of an object, the plates are rotated until the opposite edges of the double images touch each other, and the angle on the vernier of the instrument is read off. By a screw arrangement both plates may be rotated simultaneously the same number of degrees. If they are rotated 360°, there are four positions in which the object appears double, and in this way the measurements are mutually controlled. In order to observe small and distant objects accurately, a Galilean telescope is so placed, close behind the plates, that the transverse diameter of its opening coincides in all positions of the plates with their plane of division. In using this instrument, neither the distance nor the movement of the object influences the measurement. It is especially employed in measuring the reflection images of the cornea and the anterior and posterior surfaces of the lens by means of their radii of curvature. OPHTHALMOSCOPE, n. Oph-tha'l'-mo-skop. From ὀφθαλμός, the eye, and σκοπεῖν, to examine. Fr., o. Ger., Augenspiegel, Ophthalmoskop. An instrument invented by Helmholtz in 1851 for examining the media and fundus of the eye by illuminating the interior of the organ with light from a lamp placed at one side and a little behind the patient, and reflected from a plane or concave mirror directly through the pupil. The rays are reflected from the pigment-cell layer of the retina through the pupil and strike the mirror of the o. The centre of this mirror is perforated, or has a small circular space at its centre left unperforated, and through this hole or clear portion of glass the rays coming from the patient's eye pass into the eye of the observer placed immediately behind it. [F.]—Beale's demonstrating o. An o. in which the reflector and lens are inclosed in a tube, to the side of which is adapted a small lamp with a large plano-convex lens. The lens is inclined a little so as to remove out of the field of vision the reflections upon the retina. [F.]—Burke's o. An o. consisting of two concave mirrors, one for illumination and the other for uniting the rays from the patient's eye into a real inverted image. [Graefe and Saemisch (F).]—Carter's o. An o. consisting of a chin-rest, a perforated concave mirror of large aperture and long focus, and a similar convex glass so arranged that they cast an inverted image of the fundus of the patient's eye. [F.]—Coccius's o. An o. consisting of a plane metallic mirror combined with a convex illuminating lens, placed obliquely to the mirror. The mirror is perforated at the centre and mounted on a handle. On the latter is also a transverse arm, in which runs a movable bar or rod, on the upper end of which is the lens. The light is distant from the lens a few inches more than twice its focal distance. A later modification of the instrument has the convex lens fastened by a hinge to a metallic blackened frame. The latter has a large circular opening and two curved borders, so that it can be shoved up over the mirror, and the reflecting surface thus be limited to the opening of the frame. [Graefe and Saemisch (F).]—Coccius's prismatic o. An o. which consists of a rectangular prism with unequal sides, in which one of the lateral surfaces is used for reflection, the hypotenuse surface being turned toward the light. [Graefe and Saemisch (F).]—Cohn's o. A modification of Loring's o. in which the centre of the disc is not to one side of the mirror, but over it, so that it embraces a greater circumference without coming in collision with the nose of the observer. [“Klin. Mittheil. f. Augenheilk.” (F).]—Desmarres's o. An o. in which the concave mirror and handle are constructed of one piece of metal. There is no circular opening, but there are two eccentric ones, for use by the two eyes. [Graefe and Saemisch (F).]—De Wecker's and Roger's o. for two observers. An o. in which a combination of two prisms of 48° and 42°, with their hypotenuse surfaces together, is placed in front of the inverted image cast by a convex lens. A part of the rays coming from the eye of one observer, while another part, reflected from the hypotenuse surface, enters the eye of the other observer. [Graefe and Saemisch (F).]—De Wecker's o. A modification of Loring's o. in which, as in Cohn's o., a disc with 24 glasses or lenses of very small dimensions is so inserted that it can easily be rotated by means of a toothed wheel. [F.]—Epicene-Donders o. An o. consisting of a cubical box containing a plane mirror perforated at the centre and movable round its vertical axis. The box is perforated at the side corresponding to the reflecting surface of the mirror, and opens into an addition which is to receive the eye of the patient. A similar opening and addition for the eye of the observer is in the opposite side of the box. The box is prolonged laterally into a blackened tube, and in front of the end of this tube burns a lamp. [Graefe and Saemisch (F).]—Fröbelius's o. An o. based on the principle of total reflection, consisting of a decent mirror, the reflecting glass plates in Helmholtz's o. being replaced by a rectangular prism. [Graefe and Saemisch (F).]—Gillet de Grand-Mont's o. An o. consisting of a spectacle-frame which is fastened on the head of the patient. Between the clip for the two eyes, on the root of the nose, is a metallic plate from which a metallic rod projects forward. Upon this rod is set a convex lens, which can be moved in or out or before either eye. Any other o. may be used for illuminating. [Graefe and Saemisch (F).]—Giraud-Teulon's auto. An o. in which one eye looks through a perforated concave mirror, which reflects the light of a lateral lamp upon a perpendicular plane mirror, inclined at an angle of 45° to the axis of the eye. Thence the light is reflected at the same angle upon a second plane mirror turned toward the first one, which stands in front of the other eye, at an angle of 45° with its axis. This reflects the light into the other eye through a convex lens between it and the eye. [Graefe and Saemisch (F).]—Giraud-Teulon's binocular o. An o. in which a concave glass mirror of 4 $\frac{1}{2}$  ctm. diameter serves to reflect the light, which is placed above the head of the patient if the mirror rotates on a horizontal axis, and laterally if it rotates on a vertical axis. In the centre of the mirror is an unsilvered space 0.55 ctm. in diameter, and exactly in the centre of this spot two prisms meet with their sharp edges together. The rays make their exit from the prisms at a very small angle, and hence but little convergence is demanded, though there is complete relaxation of the accommodation. [Graefe and Saemisch (F).]—Giraud-Teulon's o. An o. modified from Lawrence's. A concave-convex meniscus is placed in a frame or case, and fastened to a standard so as to rotate round two axes vertical to each other. The operator has one hand free, and is thus enabled to bring any lens or prism before the opening of the cylinder, in which the inverted image of the patient's eye is cast. ["Ann. d'ocul.," 1867, livi, p. 82 (F).]—Hasner's o. 1. An o. which consists of two tubes, one sliding within the other. The light is placed at the side; the mirror reflects the light in the axis of the tube, and the convex-lens end of the tube is brought to within an inch of the patient's eye. [Graefe and Saemisch (F).] 2. An o. which consists of negative menisci the convex surfaces of which are silvered, with the exception of small central spots. [F.]—Helmholtz's o. An o. consisting of three parallel plane-glass plates, by which light is reflected at an angle of 56° into the eye of the patient. The light is thus polarized, and the corneal reflex becomes less disturbing. The observer looks obliquely through the plates, which are fixed in a prismatic box with a rectangular, three-cornered base, the plates forming the hypotenuse. The smaller perpendicular surface is perforated and opens into a cup-shaped addition which incloses the eye of the observer. [Graefe and Saemisch (F).]—Heyfelder's o. An o. consisting of a small concave glass mirror, with an unsilvered space at the centre, attached to a handle. [F.]—Jackson's o. An o. in which the revolving disc containing correcting glasses is replaced by two vertically moving slides, each containing a few glasses. By the superposition of the slides a great number of combinations can be made. [B.]—Jäger's o. 1. An o. consisting of a short cylindrical tube (cut off at one end at an angle of 60°), which can be rotated round its axis in a metallic ring firmly attached to the handle. In the end of the tube toward the patient may be inserted either a perforated plain mirror or a concave mirror. [Graefe and Saemisch (F).] 2. An o. consisting of dispersing menisci with the backs silvered. [F.]—Javal's o. An o. in which the reflector is a glass plate, covered by a very thin layer of platinum. The Rekoss's disc with its correcting-glasses is replaced by a small telescope. The refraction of the patient's eye may thus be accurately and rapidly determined. ["Gaz. hebdom.," 1870, p. 278 (F).]—Juler's o. An o. which consists of a disc, containing two series of spherical lenses, one convex, the other concave. The disc is milled at the edge, and is made to revolve to the right or left by means of two other milled discs. A sector of a similar disc is placed behind this for occasional use. It paraffin lamp, so that the position of the o. relative to the light is always the same. The rest which supports the patient's chin is independent of the instrument, and is mounted on a separate standard. [Wells (F).]—Klaunig's o. An o. which consists of a biconvex lens, silvered on one side. In the centre the silver backing is absent, so that on one side the lens acts as a concave mirror, and on the other as a convex glass. [Graefe and Saemisch (F).]—Knapp's o. A modification of the Rekoss system consisting of two undetachable revolving discs, one containing concave and the other convex glasses. These are superimposed, so that they rotate past each other, and thus the strength of each glass can be diminished by adding the different glasses of the other disc. ["Trans. of the Am. Ophth. Soc.," 1873 (F).]—Lawrence's o. 1. An o. consisting of a convex lens combined with a concave lens of 8 to 10 in. focus, the two being united as closely as possible, and held with the concave lens toward the patient's eye. 2. An o. in which the patient's eye is illuminated by an unperforated concave mirror. [Graefe and Saemisch (F).]—Liebreich's large o. An o. adapted not only for ordinary ophthalmoscopy, but also for demonstrating and sketching the fundus. It consists of two tubes, sliding one within the other. The smaller has a lateral sector cut out, to permit the lamp-light to fall on the mirror. The latter is concave, perforated at the centre, and so hung in the tube that it can be rotated round a vertical axis, and also easily removed. Behind it is a clip for the correcting-glasses. In the opposite end of the larger tube is a convex glass of 2 in. focus, hung in the same manner as the mirror. The tube containing the mirror may be replaced by the tube of a microscope. [Graefe and Saemisch (F).]—Liebreich's small o. An o. consisting of a metallic concave mirror with a central perforation, attached to a handle. [F.]—Loring's o. A form of o. especially useful in determining errors of refraction. The original instrument was so constructed as to contain the requisite convex and concave glasses in three discs, placed behind the mirror, and their rotation enables the surgeon to obtain the proper lens for examination readily. Each disc is pierced for eight glasses, forming in the aggregate a series of lenses extending, with but comparatively slight differences in focal value, from convex  $\frac{1}{2}$  to convex  $\frac{1}{4}$ , and from concave  $\frac{1}{4}$  to concave  $\frac{1}{2}$ . The first disc contains only convex glasses, one hole being left vacant to represent emmetropia without the necessity of removing the disc, and for examination of the inverted image without an eye-piece; the second disc contains concave glasses of moderate focal power; and the third disc contains the strong convex and concave glasses. The o. is contained in a separate mounting, and can be detached from the rest of the instrument, which can then be used as an optometer. Besides the ordinary concave mirror, there is a second mirror, to be used with the instrument when employed as an optometer for the determination of astigmatism. It consists of a thin plate with a slit the length of which was equal to the diameter of the perforations in the disc. This was mounted like the mirror, and made to fit in the mirror-frame in which it revolved, so as to allow the slit to correspond with any given meridian of the cornea. This plate was subsequently made with a polished surface in front to serve as a mirror for determining the amount of astigmatism in the principal meridians of the eye. Loring's first modification of his original instrument consists in replacing the detachable discs by a single stationary one, 1 $\frac{1}{2}$  in. in diameter, in which the lenses are arranged in two concentric circles. The lenses consist of 12 convex and 12 concave, the weaker ones being arranged in the outer circle. The outer or inner circle can be rapidly brought into position by sliding the disc upward or downward on the handle. This instrument has been provided with a cover in the shape of a thin flat ring, which swings on a pivot, and when closed is held in position by sliding under the edge of a second pivot. Loring's o. for determining refraction is one in which the lenses were numbered, according to the metric system, in dioptres. This admits of application to his instrument with twenty-five perforations by mounting in the disc a regular series of whole numbers, and adding a clip behind the mirror, provided with two lenses, +0.5 and -0.5, or half a dioptre. A modification of this instrument by Wadsworth consists in a very small additional circular mirror for use in the upright image. It has a diameter of 15 mm., rotates from right to left, and admits of an inclination of 20°. Loring has himself modified this in two ways. He first cut off a lateral segment of the ordinary circular concave mirror, and swung this on two vertical pins or by a hinge from the mirror case. A second modification consists in cutting off both sides of the ordinary mirror, so as to change the circle to a parallelogram. This is swung on two pivots, and admits of an inclination of 25°. It tilts both ways, and can be used for either the upright or inverted method of examination. In Loring's latest modification the essential points are that the glasses have a diameter of not less than 6 mm. and that their number is sufficiently large. This is effected by a single disc and the segment of a disc, the latter being the quadrant of a circle. The single disc contains 16 glasses on the metric system, and the quadrant contains four glasses. ["Am. Jour. of the Med. Sci.," Apr., 1890, p. 340, Jan., 1874; "Trans. of the Fifth Internat. Ophth. Congr.," 1876; "Trans. of the Am. Ophth. Soc.," 1878 (F).]—Metrie o. A single-disc or double-disc o. in which the concave and convex lenses are graduated by the metric scale. [a, 34.]—Monoyer's o. An o. made up of a glass concave mirror with a small unsilvered space at the centre set in a simple horn frame, a horn plate with two positive and one negative correcting-glasses set in an arc, and a convex lens. [Graefe and Saemisch (F).]—Monoyer's o. for three observers. A modification of Sichel's o. for two observers by the addition of a second box or frame. The principal observer looks through the hole in the mirror between the two prisms, while each of the others examines the eye through the eye-piece of one of the boxes. [F].—Murray and Heath's binocular o. An o. in which two prisms are placed behind the fixed perforated mirror so as to divide the light-pencil and reflect it right and left. The reflected portions are then received and again reflected by two adjustable mirrors. The instrument may be passed from hand to hand, and affords a complete rest to the muscular and accommodative apparatus. [Hogg (F).]—Noyes's o. A form of o. based on Loring's latest model, with a mechanism for putting at command in rapid succession the full series of glasses which may be required. There is a spring clip on the back of the instrument which will carry a cylindrical glass. It gives command of a complete set of 72 spherical glasses. [F].—Parent's o. A modification of an earlier instrument, which consists in the addition of a ring of 38 mm. diameter, upon which is fixed eccentrically a disc containing ten concave cylindrical glasses. For the determination of myopia and hypermetropia without astigmatism, the cylinders are placed with their axes vertical. [F].—Payne's o. An o. having two discs each provided with seventeen concave and convex lenses. [a, 34].—Poncet's o. An o. used by daylight, in which the lens and the mirror are distinct. [L, 88 (a, 50)].—Refraction o. An o. provided with a series of concave and convex lenses for determining the degree of refraction. [a, 34].—Rosebrugh's o. A combination of a plane mirror and a convex lens, used in photographing the fundus. It consists of two tubes arranged at right angles to each other, the one sliding within the other for a thin plane unsilvered glass plate, with a reflector, inclined to both tubes at an angle of 45°. By an arrangement of lenses in the tubes an inverted image of the rays from the patient's eye can be thrown through a glass screen into a dark box. This screen is then removed, and sensitized plates for photographing inserted in its place. [Graefe and Saemisch (F).]—Ruete's o. An o. which consists of a perforated concave mirror, fastened on an adjustable standard. On the foot are two rings, each with a horizontal arm, one carrying two lens-holders for correcting glasses, the other a black screen for lessening the illumination. The patient's eye is brought in the direction of their axis, and he looks through the hole in the mirror. [Graefe and Saemisch (F).]—Saemann's o. A combination of a convex lens and a plane mirror. The lens in its frame is mounted on the end of a portable handle, and is firmly united to a cubical box, which contains the plane mirror. This mirror rotates round its vertical axis, and at the centre the silver backing is removed from an ellipsoidal space. [Graefe and Saemisch (F).]—Sichel's o. for two observers. An o. which consists of a concave mirror, with a central perforation, which casts the light of a lamp into the patient's eye. In front of the latter is a convex glass, which focuses the returning rays into a real inverted image. From this point the rays diverge, and pass through the opening in the concave mirror into a box, the opening of which is two thirds covered by a prism, the other third remaining free. The rays passing through the free third enter directly or through a convex glass into the eye of one observer, while the other part suffers total reflection to the other end of the box, into the eye of a second observer. [Graefe and Saemisch (F).]—Sömmerring's mirror-o. An o. which consists of a mirror affixed to the tube of a microscope above the eye-piece, inclined at an angle of 45° to the axis of the microscope. The observer looks through this mirror toward a distant scale on which the divisions of the micrometer are read off. [F].—Stellwag's o. An o. which consists of a perforated concave mirror of 6 in. focus, attached to a handle by a ball-and-socket joint. On this handle is also a parallel arm which carries a Reuss's disc with eight correcting-glasses. [Graefe and Saemisch (F).]—Ulrich's o. 1. An o. in which the concave mirror and correcting-lenses are placed in a tube, which opens into a shorter tube, before which a light burns. This light falls into the larger tube at an angle of 40°, and is reflected by a concave mirror. 2. A de-centred or prismatic mirror. Two prisms, the sections of which form isosceles right-angled triangles, are so united that two lateral surfaces lie in one surface or plane, while the planes of the hypotenuse surfaces are perpendicular to each other. The principle involved is that of total reflection. [Graefe and Saemisch (F).]—Williams's o. An o. which consists of two small, perforated concave mirrors so placed in a spectacle-frame that each may be rotated round a vertical axis. [F].—Zehender's o. A combination of a metallic convex mirror with a convex lens. The mirror has a central funnel-shaped perforation, and is mounted on a simple handle, which can be screwed on either side, according to the position of the light. [Graefe and Saemisch (F).]

OPIONIN, n.  $\text{Op}^{i2}\text{-o}^2\text{n}^{i2}\text{n}$ . A body obtained from Smyrna opium, forming concentrically grouped, small, colorless, acicular crystals melting at  $227^\circ\text{C}$ , soluble in alkalies, freely soluble in alcohol and in ether, almost insoluble in boiling water. It is without action on litmus, and appears to contain no nitrogen. By boiling with milk of lime, it is converted into an acid freely soluble in water and in ether. On fusing o. with potassa, opionylic acid is obtained, which crystallizes from ether in thick prisms, is readily soluble in water, melts at  $126^\circ\text{C}$ , and in neutral solutions gives with silver nitrate an amorphous precipitate, becoming crystallized. Both acids, when in alkaline solutions, yield precipitates with lead acetate. ["Proc. of the Am. Pharm. Assoc.," xxxiii, p. 348 (a, 50); J. M. Maisch, "Am. OPIUM [U. S. Ph., Br. Ph., Fr. Cod., Ger. Ph., Belg. Ph., Netherl. Ph., Dan. Ph., Swed. Ph., Norw. Ph., Russ. Ph., Gr. Ph., Austr. Ph., Hung. Ph., Finn. Ph.] (Lat.), n. n.  $\text{Op}(\text{o}^2\text{p})/\text{i}^2\text{-u}^2\text{m}(\text{u}^2\text{m})$ . Gr., ὀπιον. Fr., o. Ger., o. Mohnsaft. It., Sp., opio [Sp. Ph.]. Rom., opiu [Rom. Ph.]. Ar., afyun. Chin., o-fu-yung, opien. Pers., thir-i-kush. Turk., afyun. Mal., caruppa. Tam., apini. Tel., abini. Syn.: o. crudum [Swiss Ph.], ludanum, meconium. The inspissated juice of the unripe capsules of Papaver somniferum and its varieties. In commerce it occurs in various forms and qualities (see the subheadings), but that used in medicine, containing not less than 9 per cent. (U. S. Ph.) or between 9.5 and 10.5 per cent. (Br. Ph.) of morphine, is of a fawn or reddish-brown (in powder, a yellowish-brown) color and of a compact texture, and has the sp. gr. of 1.336. It has a peculiar narcotic odor and a sharp bitter taste. In the interior it is usually soft and tenacious, but on exposure to the air becomes hard and brittle, displaying a shining surface when broken. It is insoluble in ether, but soluble in variable proportions in water, in alcohol, and in diluted acids, and imparts to these a deep brown color. Besides water, resin, fatty matter, gum (distinct from gum arabic), caoutchouc (about 11 per cent.), pectin, a wax (see O-wax), glucose, and other substances not yet definitely determined, o. contains numerous alkaloids (see O. alkaloids), of which codeine, narcotine, narceine, and especially morphine are used in medicine. These bases occur in combination with meconic and lactic acids. Two neutral principles, meconin and meconosin, have also been isolated. O. in its effects is a stimulant narcotic, acting directly upon the cerebrum, resembling those of its principal alkaloid, morphine. In sufficient doses it slows the pulse by stimulating the inhibitory nerves of the heart and destroys life by paralyzing the respiratory centres in the medulla. It differs from morphine, however, in being more convulsant, stimulating, diaphoretic, and constipating, and on the other hand in being less hypnotic and anodyne and in causing much less pruritus. O. is chiefly used for the relief of pain, but its diversity of properties (its primarily excitant action, its powerful antispasmodic effect, its calmative influence in nervous irritation and morbid wakefulness, its stimulant action upon the cutaneous secretions while diminishing the nervous energy upon which other excessive secretions depend) gives it a wider range in medicine than that of any other known drug. It is contra-indicated in determination of the blood to the head. An unconquerable longing for o. or one of its alkaloids often leads to its habitual use, which causes emaciation, anæmia, headache, vertigo, wakefulness, tremor, and mental disturbance. [A, 496; B, 5, 18, 172, 178, 180, 185 (a, 35).]—Abkari o. Ph.]), expressing, mixing the two liquids, filtering, adding 30 parts [Fr. Cod.] (50 [Sp. Ph.]) of sugar, and evaporat-

ing the solution to 200 parts having a sp. gr. of 1.25 [Fr. Cod., Sp. Ph.]; or by macerating 100 parts of o., 8 of saffron, 25 of nutmeg, and 50 of sugar (all coarsely powdered) for a week with 600 of vinegar, heating half an hour over the water bath, expressing, stirring a little vinegar into the residue, expressing again, allowing the mixed colatures to stand a day, filtering, evaporating to 190 parts by gentle heat, and adding, when cool, 10 parts of dilute alcohol. It occurs in masses of varying size, usually from  $\frac{1}{2}$  lb. to 2 lbs. in weight, originally round but flattened or irregular from mutual pressure in the packing cases. Internally it is moist, coarsely granular, and brown. If a lump of it is cut and then carefully torn, small glistening tears are seen (resembling seeds, but distinguished by pressing with the finger). The masses are covered with the remains of poppy-leaves and "trash" (pieces of the fruits of a species of Rumex thrown in by the packers to prevent the adhesion of the cakes). Tincture of o., made in general by macerating or digesting o. with from 1 to 12 times as much alcohol more or less diluted. The Netherl. Ph. orders 1 part each of powdered o. and 91-per-cent. alcohol and 4 parts of Spanish wine, to be macerated for a week. The U. S. preparation consists of 10 parts of powdered o., macerated for 12 hours with 4 parts of boiling water and 4 of 82-per-cent. alcohol with enough 93-per-cent. alcohol to make 100 parts after treatment in a percolator. The Br. preparation consists of 14 oz. of powdered o., macerated 7 days with 1 pint or as much more of 92-per-cent. alcohol as is necessary to make 20 fl. oz. The Fr. Cod. simply orders 1 part of extract of o. to be dissolved in 12 parts of 60-per-cent. alcohol. Various older pharmacopœias give similar preparations, generally ordering wine instead of (or with) alcohol. [B, 95, 119 (a, 38).]—Tinctura opii ammoniata [Br. Ph., Russ. Ph.]. Fr., alcoolé ammoniacal d'o., teinture d'o. ammoniacée (ou d'o. et de benzoate d'ammoniac). A preparation made by macerating together for 7 days 100 grains of powdered o., 180 each of saffron and benzoic acid, 1 fl. drachm of oil of anise, 4 fl. oz. of caustic ammonia solution, and 16 fl. oz. of 84-per-cent. alcohol or as much more as will make 20 fl. oz. of filtered tincture

[Br. Ph.]; or by macerating 5 parts of powdered o. with 9 of saffron for 5 days and dissolving in the liquid 9 parts of benzoic acid, 3 of oil of fennel, 96 of caustic ammonia solution, and 384 of 90-per-cent. alcohol or as much more as is necessary to make 500 parts of filtered tincture. The kindred preparation of certain older pharmacopœias, known as tinctura opii ammoniata, or laudanium liquidum Warneri, was made by digesting for 10 days and decanting a mixture of 22 grammes each of o. and Alicante soap and 270 of spirit of ammonia with 4 of nutmeg, 7 of camphor, and  $\frac{1}{2}$  of saffron. Ph.] (seu camphore composita [Br. Ph.], seu extracti opii camphorata [Fr. Cod.]). A preparation made by macerating or digesting powdered o., benzoic acid, camphor, oil of anise, and (generally diluted) alcohol. The U. S., Swiss, and Gr. preparations contain equal parts of o., benzoic acid, camphor, and oil of anise, with about 200 parts of alcohol (diluted [Swiss Ph., Gr. Ph.]) to 1 part of o., and the U. S. Ph. orders 10 parts of glycerin to be added. The other preparations contain less camphor and oil of anise, the Ger., Finn., and Russ. preparations also more benzoic acid, in proportion to the o. The Fr. Cod. orders extract of o. Some of the older pharmacopœias ordered 4 parts each of o., benzoic acid, and oil of anise, with 15 of extract of licorice, 62 of honey,  $\frac{1}{2}$  of camphor, and 910 of brandy. Others ordered the same amount of o., benzoic acid, and camphor, replacing brandy by alcohol, and omitting the oil of anise and other ingredients. An instrument for determining the refraction of an eye, mainly used for detecting and determining the amount of ametropia. 2. Of Porterfield, an instrument used in measuring the limits of distinct vision, and in determining with exactness the strength of sight. [F.]—Burrow's o. An o. consisting of a tube which can be elongated, in the ocular end of which is a lens of 4 in. focus, while in the other end is a ground-glass plate with test types photographed on it. [F.]—Donders's and Hasner's o. An o. consisting of a horizontal rectangular board, 5 feet long and 9 in. wide, which stands on a pedestal. Three grooves run its entire length, into which, by suitable manipulation, a bar with a perpendicular wire-o. or a screen with fine openings may be shoved. The distance between the two outside grooves measures 20 lines, and nearly corresponds to that between parallel visual lines. If the object is moved in the middle groove, both eyes strongly converge. At one end of the board is a gap for the nose of the patient, and in front of his eyes are two semicircles for holding the correcting-glasses. Two vertical rods maintain the head in place by pressure on the malar prominences. [F.]—Holden's o. An o. consisting of a disc with two perforations in it, 1 mm. in diameter and 4 mm. apart, through which the patient looks at a flame. Before one of the apertures a vertical prism tinted red is placed. Two images of the flame are then seen, which, if the patient is emmetropic, are one over the other, but which, if he is ametropic, are oblique. In the latter case the prism is rotated until the images stand in the same vertical line, when the degree of rotation indicates the amount of ametropia. ["Ber. d. VII. internat. Ophth. Congr.," p. 439 (B).]—Javal's o. An o. for the rapid determination and correction of astigmatism. It is in the form of a stereoscope, mounted on a stand, and supplied with convex spherical lenses of about 5 in. focus. Two circles are drawn side by side on card-board, as in a stereoscope plate, the distance between their centres corresponding to that between the eyes. In one figure are drawn a series of radiating lines, and at their extremities are placed the figures i to xii. If the visual lines are parallel, the two circles are fused into one image, in the centre of which lie the radiating stripes and at the circumference the figures. By means of a screw, the circles are removed farther and farther from the eyes, until all the radiating lines except one become indistinct. The direction of this one corresponds to the diameter of the highest refraction. Behind the ocular lens of the one eye a series of concave cylindrical lenses are so arranged on a pivot that they can be rapidly rotated in front of the eye until the lens is found which corrects the astigmatism and indicates its degree. [F.]—Laurence's o. An o. consisting of a shoemaker's rule which bears on one of the slides a page with printed letters. [F.]—Lehot's o. An o. consisting of a three-foot rule covered with black velvet. Along its entire length runs a white thread. If one end of the o. is pressed against the lower eyelid in a horizontal direction, the thread at the distance of distinct vision appears single, but on both sides of this double.

[F.]—Perrin and Mascart's o. An o. consisting of a metallic tube attached to a standard. At one end is a ground-glass plate with parallel black lines for the determination of the visual acuity and astigmatism, and at the other a strong ocular lens. The tube can not be elongated, but between the ocular and objective a powerful concave lens may be inserted, which can be moved along in either direction by a toothed wheel. [F.]—Smee's o. An o. consisting of a graduated scale, along which may be moved a board with test types on it. At the ocular end are four convex glasses: 1/30, 1/10, 1/5, 1/2. Through one of these glasses the test object is observed. [F.]—Stamper's o. An o. depending on the same principle as Young's o. It consists of a tube which may be elongated, at the ocular end of which are a convex lens of 5 in. focus, and a plate with two slits about 1/4 line wide and 1/2 line apart. A slit on the other side of the tube, 1/4 line wide, serves as a fixation object; it runs parallel with the other slits, and is covered with ground glass. The distance at which the slit is seen single is determined by shoving in and out this lattice. [F.]—Von Graefe's o. An o. consisting of a small square steel frame, across which a number of delicate parallel vertical wires are stretched. This frame may be attached to a graduated brass rod, on which it is movable. One end of the rod is placed against the forehead of the patient, and the frame is moved to the nearest point at which the individual wires still look clearly and sharply defined. The distance of this point from the eye is read off from the graduated scale and put down as the near point. The frame is then removed to the greatest distance at which the individual wires still appear sharply defined, and this is noted as the far point. The distance between gives the range of accommodation. [F.]—Young's o. An o. consisting of a small ivory plate, 8 in. long and 1 in. wide, with a black stripe along its entire length. At one end there is a vertical metallic plate with parallel vertical slits. While this is held as near as possible to the pupil, the eye fixes the black line. This appears double for all distances outside the point of accommodation. An index, movable on a scale on the o., marks the point of single vision. [F.]
